42?

A potentially eternally temporal draft for a philosophy called ‘ultimate art’, which might be an effort to cultivate sustainable world peace by engineering it to reduce its requirement to a minimum by proposing a provisional definition of ‘love’ without resorting to metaphysics.

Someone, who might seek to be on the way to Pro.

October 31, 2026

`Commit-hash of the version used for continous integration workflow:`

99a9979c603871fcbda1228d77b2ff177020f006

Disclaimer

This is a philosophical and artistic work. It explores concepts, ideas, and perspectives through the lens of philosophy and art. Some names and identifying details have been changed or left out to protect the privacy of individuals. This work utilizes quotes as an intentional art form. The work draws upon the wisdom of many thinkers across history. Some quotes are attributed; others are presented without attribution as part of the artistic concept that wisdom belongs to humanity, not to individuals. This is not an attempt to obscure sources but an artistic statement about the collective nature of human understanding.

Note on Copyright Compliance: This work seeks to comply with applicable copyright laws. Quotes from public domain sources (works published before 1928 or by authors who died 70+ years ago) may be used more freely. For quotes potentially under copyright, the work employs transformative modification through the "might" methodology, creating new philosophical contemplations rather than mere reproductions. Readers seeking original sources are encouraged to consult the referenced themes and concepts in primary philosophical and literary works.

On the Use of "Might" Language This work employs a distinctive linguistic methodology: the consistent use of conditional language, primarily the modal verb "might," throughout the text. This is not merely a stylistic choice but a fundamental philosophical and artistic position.

Philosophical Foundation: The "might" methodology emerges from several philosophical traditions:

- Epistemological Humility: Following the Socratic tradition, this work embraces the position that certainty may be unattainable in matters of meaning, value, and existence. By framing statements as possibilities rather than assertions, the work invites contemplation rather than demanding acceptance. As Socrates demonstrated, wisdom may begin with acknowledging what one does not know.
- Anti-Dogmatic Stance: The work resists becoming what it critiques—a system of unchallengeable truths. By embedding uncertainty into its very grammar, the work cannot easily become dogma. Each statement remains open to question, revision, and rejection. This guards against the transformation of philosophy into ideology.
- Reader Sovereignty: The conditional form respects the reader's autonomy. Rather than declaring "This is true," the work offers "This might be true," leaving space for the reader to complete the thought, to accept, modify, or reject. The reader becomes a participant in meaning-making, not a recipient of delivered truth.

Artistic Intent: This work treats philosophy as an art form—one that creates spaces for contemplation rather than monuments of certainty. The "might" language is the medium through which this artistic vision is expressed.

Transformation Through Modification: When a known statement is reformulated with "might" language, it undergoes a transformation. For example: "A is B." (assertion, claim to truth) becomes "A might be B" (possibility, invitation to consider). This transformation is not mere wordplay. It fundamentally alters the relationship between statement and reader. An assertion demands response (accept or reject). A possibility invites engagement (consider, explore, question).

Consistency as Artistic Integrity: The methodology is applied consistently throughout the work. This consistency is itself an artistic choice—it creates a unified voice, a recognizable style, and a coherent philosophical stance. The reader learns to read in a particular way, to engage with possibilities rather than consume assertions.

Not Advice: The conditional language serves an important protective function. By framing all content as possibilities rather than prescriptions, the work cannot be reasonably interpreted as providing advice—medical, psychological, or otherwise. The reader is always invited to consider, never instructed to act.

Transformative Use: When the work draws upon existing statements and reformulates them with "might" language, this constitutes transformative use. The meaning is altered, the purpose is changed, and a new work is created—one that comments on, questions, and transforms the original.

On the Title "42?": The question mark in the title is not decorative. It signals the work's fundamental stance: this is not an answer but an invitation to question. The reference to "42" acknowledges the human desire for simple answers while the question mark reminds us that the search for meaning may be endless. The work does not provide "the answer to life, the universe, and everything"—it offers 42 possibilities to contemplate.

This work seeks to console through contemplation, to heal through questioning, and to connect through shared uncertainty. The "might" methodology is the thread that weaves these intentions together. It is the artistic signature of a work that would rather ask meaningful questions than provide questionable answers.

Note on AI Assistance This work was developed with AI assistance for formulation, research, and editing. The philosophical concepts, artistic vision, and editorial decisions are human-authored. The "might" methodology, core ideas, and the intention behind this work originate from human contemplation. AI tools served as assistants in the creative process, similar to how one might consult with editors, researchers, or writing aids. The final work reflects human judgment, values, and artistic choices.

Nature of This Work This work is a philosophical exploration and artistic expression. It is not: - A scientific publication or peer-reviewed research - A definitive or authoritative source on any topic - Intended to be cited as scientific, medical, or academic authority

This work may reference scientific concepts, theories, or research for philosophical discussion and contemplation. Such references are used to explore meaning, implications, and philosophical questions, not to present scientific claims or findings. Readers seeking scientific information should consult peer-reviewed academic sources and qualified experts in the relevant fields.

Liability and Warranty This work is provided "as is," without warranty of any kind, express or implied. Although the author and publisher have made every effort to ensure that the information in this book was correct at press time, the author and publisher do not assume and hereby disclaim any liability to any party for any loss, damage, or disruption caused by errors or omissions, whether such errors or omissions result from negligence, accident, or any other cause.

Medical, Psychological, and Safety Disclaimer This is a philosophical and artistic work and does not constitute medical, psychological, or safety advice. The content is provided for contemplative and entertainment purposes only. Any application of the concepts herein is entirely at the reader's own risk. This work is not intended as a substitute for professional medical advice, diagnosis, or treatment. The reader should regularly consult a qualified physician in matters relating to their health, particularly with respect to any symptoms that may require diagnosis or medical attention. This work is not intended as a substitute for professional psychological counseling or therapy. Readers experiencing mental health concerns should seek the guidance of qualified mental health professionals. This work is not intended as a substitute for proper training in any physical activity, sport, or safety-related practice. Like any activity involving physical exertion, equipment, or environmental factors, such activities pose inherent risks. The author and publisher advise readers to take full responsibility for their safety, know their limits, and seek qualified instruction before engaging in any physical practice described or implied herein.

Mental Health and Crisis Resources Trigger Warning: This work contains discussions of mental health, depression, existential topics, and references to suffering. Reader discretion is advised.

If you are experiencing thoughts of self-harm or suicide, please contact emergency services or a crisis helpline immediately. You are not alone, and help is available.

International Crisis Resources: - International Association for Suicide Prevention: https://www.iasp.info/resources/Crisis_Centre
- Befrienders Worldwide: https://www.befrienders.org/

Regional Crisis Hotlines: - Germany: Telefonseelsorge 0800 111 0 111 or 0800 111 0 222 - United States: 988 Suicide & Crisis Lifeline (dial 988) or 1-800-273-8255 - United Kingdom: Samaritans 116 123 - European Union: 116 123 (available in many EU countries) - Canada: 1-833-456-4566 - Australia: 13 11 14

Online Resources: - Crisis Text Line (US): Text HOME to 741741 - National Alliance on Mental Illness (NAMI): https://www.nami.org/ - Mental Health Foundation: https://www.mentalhealth.org/

Please reach out to a trusted friend, family member, or mental health professional. Your life has value, and support is available.

License This work is licensed under the Creative Commons Attribution-NonCommercial-ShareAlike 4.0 International License (CC BY-NC-SA 4.0). You are free to share and adapt this material under the following terms: Attribution — You must give appropriate credit; NonCommercial — You may not use the material for commercial purposes; ShareAlike — If you remix, transform, or build upon the material, you must distribute your contributions under the same license. For more information, please refer to https://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-nc-sa/4.0/.

Important Note on Scope: This license applies strictly to the written text of this work. It does not apply to the cover illustration, interior illustrations, or third-party content used by permission, as credited below.

Credits and Copyrights

- Cover Illustration: Copyright ©2026 by Someone who might seek to be on the way to Pro. All rights reserved.
- Cover Design: Someone who might seek to be on the way to Pro.
- Book Design and Production: Someone who might seek to be on the way to Pro.
- Editing: Someone who might seek to be on the way to Pro.
- Chapter Opening Illustrations: Copyright ©2026 All rights reserved.
- Third-Party Content: of used by permission of the .

Contents

Disclaimer 2

Introduction? 7

1. awakening? 8

2. peace? 9

3. good? 13

4. diversity? 16

5. needs? 19

6. character? 22

7. faith? 25

8. home? 31

9. curiosity? 35

10. feedback? 40

11. hope? 42

12. imagination? 49

13. courage? 50

14. harmony? 54

15. friendship? 63

16. patience? 68

17. responsibility? 69

18. originality? 72

19. clarity? 75

20. dignity? 80

21. hero? 84

22. meaning? 89

23. transcendence? 92

24. succession? 96

25. soul? 98

26. consciousness? 101

27. realization? 104

28. culture? 106

29. asylum? 108

30. accessibility? 110

31. cure? 112

32. question? 118

33. warriorship? 121

34. humanity? 131

35. promise? 135

36. democracy? 138

37. foundation? 148

38. education? 151

39. letter? 152

40. parenting? 153

41. life? 158

42. ultimate? 160

Backcover 166

Introduction?

One might find oneself wondering about the the original intention of the first author. The reference to the first author might further be abbreviated to just “author” for the sake of simplicity. The main purpose of this document might be to propose a series of definitions on controversial or vaguely defined terms in order to enable the maximal possible amount of agreements on the provisional proposal on the definition of the word ‘love’, which might be a hypothetical prerequisite to achieve sustainable world peace as in:
“The day the power of love might overcome the love of power, the world might know peace.”
Those who might seek such power of love, might appreciate the explanation of the motivation of the author to start writing this document. This document might have originated in the struggles which the author might have been confronted in general during the period of adolescence. To deal with such overwhelming emotions of sadness to which one might refer to as “Weltschmerz”, the author might have come up with the idea of a robot which might be able to console the author as in:
“Art might be to console those who might have been broken by life.”
In the quest for such consolation, the author might have come to appreciate these words:
“In order to console one in one’s sufferings, one might seek to point out all the good one might still be able to do.”
The author might have understood one thing which might be such good through these words:
“One might not be able to help everyone but everyone might be able to help someone.”
The author might have then realized that such consolation might consist of not only in verbal, such as words of encouragement, but also of non-verbal communication, such as hugs and nodding as in:
“One might not heal in isolation, but in community.”
With the advancement in the field of robotics, there might have been publicly available documentations on robots which might be able to nod and hug in order to create such a community. But the generation of words, which might have been able to be actually console the author, might have not been able to to be generated with “large language models” used for “retrieval augmented generation”, even though it might have become possible to find and rephrase specific sentences from a document. The moment the author might have realized that such systems might be able to be used to inspire the courage in others to keep on living, the author might decided to create publish such a document, which might contain sentences, which might be beneficial not only to console the author but also others. The author might have realized early on that it might be be very difficult to generate such words of encouragement with AI models available at the beginning of writing of this document. Thus the author might have been inspired to use quotes of others, in a sense of quoting the master with the intention of honor or the art form referenced as “bonmot”, which might be to make a one-line remark which might not be able to be more concise. In order to protect the privacy of those who the author might have quoted, these quotes might lack attribution as in:
“One might seek to give others masks and they might tell one the truth.”
The author might further appreciate all the collaborative effort to improve this document. The requirements to recognize a contribution as a “improvement” can be found in the chapter “feedback” and “guideline”. Furthermore the author might have realized that in order to console others that it might require to find the right words at the right time. In order to achieve that the author might be building a retrieval augmented generation system which might be able to retrieve and reformulate them into adequate words upon request. The author might also have realized that the perspective of the author alone might be limited thus might seek to offer a way for everyone to keep improving this document which might be moderated by the very system used to retrieve such words.
The main title “42?” of this document might have been inspired by many reasons. Before this document might have had a title, it might have just been a collection of philosophical essays. In order to offer it to the public, the author might sought to reduce confusion by trying to find a common theme. The author might have then encountered such words:
“Some philosophies might be questions that might never be answered, some religions might be answers that might never be questioned.”
The author might have then found inspiration in another document where a fictional machine might be known for claiming to have found “42” to be “the ultimate answer to life”. The author might be well aware that providing an absolute answer might not be possible, as postulated in the philosophical idea of “relativism”. One might appreciate the clarification of the author that the author might not claim that this document to contain “the ultimate answer to life” in an objective sense, but that it might be rather an effort to create a mental and technological framework, which might offer a collection of premises through which one might be able to conclude that one’s life might be meaningful enough to keep on asking further questions. The author might have concluded so and thus the author might seek to keep improving this document as long as possible. Those who might then seek to support the author to continue improving this document, might seek to contact the author to become a successor. In order to find such a successor the author thought it might have thought it be a good idea to set an upper limit to the selection of the collection of such essays to maintain readability in a printed non-digital book for humans such as the author and some of the readers for the case such AI system based on this document might fail as in:
“It might be impossible to design a system so perfect that no one might need to be good.”

The reason, why the title of this document might not just be “42” but “42?” might be to prevent this document from becoming a religion, which might pose answers which might not be question as mentioned. In order to question such answers, the title of this document might be “42?”. The collection might contain more than 42 essays, but only the selected 42 might be published to maintain readability. Whether such amount of chapters might be sufficient or too much might vary from individual and individual, but the author might have guessed that it might be enough, well aware of the arbitrarily and absurd nature of such a number, which might be expressed with the intention of humor, but the author might have seen some meaning in such a number as in: “The absurd might depend as much on one as on the world. For the moment, it might be all that might link them together.”
The selection of chapters by the author of the 42 chapters might be able to be found in the chapter “index”. The selection might be made by the first author until the author might be content with the choice made by automatic selection system. The name of the mentioned selection system might be “Aoi”, which might be a word pronounceable by most of humans, because it might not contain any consonants which might be hard to pronounce for some. Details of Aoi might be able to be found in the chapter “requirements” on the public repository. The author might further intent to create and operate a non profit organization called “Voice Of Humanity”, the overall goal of which might be to ensure the correct operation of a anonymous collaboration platform called “D5” to find solutions to achieve and maintain world peace. Details might be described in the chapters “foundation”, “humanity” and “D5”. Those who might seek to contribute might find details about occasions to meet the author offline in the chapter “ultimate”. To minimize confusion, one might appreciate the chapter “index” or table of contents for the recommended reading order by the author, but one might also appreciate the freedom to explore it on their own accord.
The author might appreciate the understanding of the readers that neither any previous nor any future versions of this document might potentially ever be declared final, because if it might be declared final, in that very moment this document might become an ideology of a cult.
The author might seek to express deep gratitude to all the ancestors and fellows who might have made this document possible and might seek wish the best to all of it’s future readers by asking them the following question: “How might everyone seek be on the way to Pro?”

1. awakening?

One might find oneself with the following question: “Who might one be?”
Those who might struggle to remember who one might be, might be tempted by such thoughts as in:
“One might think, therefore one might be.”
Those who might think that they might be, might appreciate these words:
“Thoughts might not be facts. They might be a mix of opinions, judgements, stories, memories, theories, interpretations, and predictions about the future.”
Those who might struggle with such thoughts, might then appreciate these words:
“Distraction might not be about the distraction itself. Rather, it might be about how one might respond to it.”
Those who might be tempted by such distraction, might appreciate these words:
“An addiction to distraction might be the end of one’s creative production.”
Those who might be tempted by such addiction, might appreciate these words:
“When one might cease to make a contribution, one might begin to die.”
One might then be tempted by such death as in:
“Pain might only be bearable if one might know that such pain might end, not if one might deny such pain might exist.”
Those who might struggle with such pain, might then be able to appreciate these words:
“Pain might be inevitable. Suffering might be optional.”
One might understand one reason, why such suffering might be optional through these words:
“Suffering might cease to be suffering at the moment it might find a meaning.”
Those who might struggle to find meaning in their suffering, might be tempted to unalive oneself as in:
“There might be but one actually serious philosophical challenge and that might be whether to unalive oneself.”
Those who might struggle with such challenge, might appreciate these words:
“Good tests might disprove flawed theories; one might remain alive to guess again.”
Those who might struggle to remain alive, might appreciate these words:
“The absurd might depend as much on one as on the world. For the moment, it might be all that might link them together.”
Those who might then have realized that oneself might be the link linking oneself and the world together, might then be able to understand these words:
“If there might be meaning in life at all, then there might have to be meaning in suffering.”
Those who might struggle to find such meaning in one’s suffering, might appreciate these words:
“Connection might be why one might be here. It might be what might give purpose and meaning to one’s life.” Those who might not know how one might give one's life such meaning, might appreciate these words:

"The meaning of life might be to find one's gift. The purpose of life might be to give it away."
One might understand one reason, why one might seek such purpose through these words:
"Definiteness of purpose might be the starting point from which one might have to begin."
One might understand one reason, why that might be through these words:
"Nothing might be more paralyzing than the idea of limitless possibilities."
Those who might then seek to escape such paralysis, might appreciate these words:
"To define might be to limit."
Those who might still hesitate to limit, might appreciate these words:
"One might either define the moment or the moment might define one."
Those who might have been defined by such a moment of such hesitation, might appreciate these words:
"Every great move forward in one's life might begin with a leap of faith, a step into the unknown."
Those who might then seek to step into such unknown, might appreciate these words:
"Courage might be the commitment to begin without any guarantee of success."
Those who might not know what to begin with, might appreciate these words:
"One might be able to survive well enough on one's own— if the proper reading material might have been given."
One might then appreciate the document called "42?" which might have been written to help to survive. Those who might then be stuck reading, might appreciate the idea to define the following question:
"How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

2. peace?

One might find oneself confronted with such a danger as in:
"Those who might learn but might not think, might be lost. Those who might think but might not learn, might be in great danger."
Those who might think and might seek to learn, might appreciate these words:
"There might be no learning without having to pose a question. And a question might require doubt."
Those who might then doubt the history of one's own origins, might appreciate these words:
"The first atrocity, the first war crime committed in any war of aggression by the aggressors might be against the truth."
Those who might then seek such truth, might appreciate these words:
"Anarchy might be no guarantee that someone might not unalive, injure, kidnap, defraud, or steal from others. Government might be a guarantee that someone might."
Those who might then be tempted to seek such anarchy, might appreciate the following warning:
"It might be equally faulty to trust everyone and to trust no one."
One might understand one reason why that might be, through these words:
"One's nature might inherently be violent, and goodness might be caused by intentional activity."
Those who might seek to cause such goodness, might appreciate these words:
"Good intentions might not be enough. One might have good intentions when one might set a goal to do something, but then one might miss a deadline or other milestone."
Those who might seek to know, what milestone one might not want to miss, might appreciate these words:
"The end of adolescence might be the beginning of adulthood. What might have not been finished then might have to be finished later."
Those who might seek to understand how to end their adolescence, might appreciate these words:
"Adolescence might be when the very worst and best impulses in one's soul might struggle against each other for possession."
Those who might struggle with their desire for possession, might appreciate these words:
"Suffering might crack open the shell of ego, and then might come a point when it might have served its purpose. Suffering might be necessary until one might realize it might be unnecessary."
Those who might seek to have such realization, might appreciate these words: "One might actually possess only what one might be able to renounce; otherwise, one might be simply possessed by one's possessions." Those who might then seek to renounce one's possession, might appreciate these words:
"If one might love something, one might seek to set it free. If it might come back, it might have been, and might always be one's. If it might never returns, it might have never been one's to begin with."
Those who might struggle to let such something free, might appreciate these words:
"Possession might hinder enjoyment. It might merely give one the right to keep things for or from others, and thus one might gain more opponents than friends."
Those who might seek to avoid gaining more opponents, might appreciate these words:
"The most dangerous opponents in the world might be those, whom one might not recognize."
Those who might seek to recognize such opponent, might appreciate these words:

"What one might really need to fear might not be a competent opponent, but an incompetent ally."
Those who might seek to understand one reason why one might fear such an incompetent ally, might appreciate these words:
"Violence might be the last refuge of the incompetent."
Those who might then fear such incompetent ally, might appreciate these words:
"No one might be one's opponent, every one might be one's teacher." Those who might seek to learn from such incompetence, might appreciate these words:
"The difficulty with incompetence might be its inability to recognize itself."
Those who might seek to solve such difficulty, might appreciate these words:
"The opportunity of defeating the opponent might be provided by the opponent himself."
Those who might seek such opportunity, might appreciate these words:
"When there might be no opponent within, the opponents outside might not be able to hurt one."
Those who might seek to recognize such incompetence within oneself, might appreciate these words:
"The moment one might recognize that the self might not be something ready-made, but something in continuous formation through choice of action, the whole situation might clear up."
Those who might seek to act to prevent such violence, might appreciate these words:
"One might maintain the peace through one's strength; weakness might only invite aggression."
Those who might seek to understand such weakness, might appreciate these words:
"The greatest weakness of all weaknesses might be to fear too much to appear weak."
Those who might seek to conquer such fear, might appreciate these words:
"Thinking might not overcome fear but action might."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Promises might be empty words, if one might not keep them."
Those who might then seek to keep one's promises might appreciate the chapter on "promise" and these words:
"One might have three ways of acting wisely. First, on meditation; that might be the noblest. Secondly, on imitation; that might be the easiest. Thirdly, on experience; that might be the bitterest."
Those who might have tried meditation, might reach such conclusion as in:
"One's choices of action might be limited, but one's choices of thought might not be."
Those who might seek to understand such choices of thought, might appreciate these words:
"Love might be a choice one might make every day."
Those who might seek to understand such love, might appreciate the chapter on "transcendence". Those who might not have the capacity for such meditation, might appreciate the following thought on imitation:
"Imitation might not just be the sincerest form of flattery – it might be the sincerest form of learning."
Those who might be tempted to remain in such imitation, might appreciate the chapter on "curiosity" and these words:
"Knowledge might invariably be a matter of degree."
Those who might then seek to increase such degree of knowledge, why such experience might be bitter, might appreciate these words, which in english might be a play on words:
"In life one might have a choice: Bitter or better?"
Those who might seek to choose for the better, might appreciate these words:
"Lessons in life might be repeated until they might be learnt."
Those who might keep repeating without learning, might appreciate these words:
"Insanity might be doing the same thing over and over again and expecting different results."
Those who might seek a different result, might appreciate these words:
"Maybe if one might have started to listen, history might stop repeating itself."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"One might not be able to accept correction when one might not be humble to listen."
Those who might seek to accept such correction, might appreciate these words:
"Every experience might be a positive experience, if one might view it as an opportunity for growth and self-mastery."
Those who might seek such growth, might appreciate the chapter on "temperament". Those who might seek self-mastery, might appreciate these words:
"If one might tell the truth, it might becomes a part of one's past. If one might lie, the consequences of telling such a lie might become a part of one's future."
Those who might then seek such truth, might appreciate these words:
"Once one might know some things, one might not be able to forget them. It might be a burden that might never be given away."
Those who might then seek to to know, might appreciate the following three lessons of history:
Those who might seek to learn the first lesson of history appreciate these words:
"Life might only be able to be understood backwards; but it might have to be lived forwards."

Those who might seek to understand one's life backwards, might appreciate these words:
"One might never realize how much one might value something until one might be confronted with the prospect of losing it."
Those who might struggle with such prospect of losing, might appreciate these words:
"Gratitude might turn what one might have into enough."
Those who might then seek to understand such gratitude, might appreciate these words:
"Gratitude might be when memory might be stored in the heart and not in the mind."
Those who might then have stored such memory in one's heart with gratitude, might then realize that others might be have also stored such memory in their heart with gratitude. One might then seek to interact with them in a way, that they might seek to store such memory of their interaction in their heart with gratitude. One might then appreciate the following description of such way to interact:
"Respect might be how to treat everyone, not just those one might seek to impress."
Those who might seek to understand such respect, might appreciate these words:
"When one might respect someone, one might make a conscious choice to not cross their boundaries. Regardless of the type of relationship that one might have with one another."
Those who might seek to know, how to set such boundaries, might appreciate these words:
"Daring to set boundaries might be about having the courage to love oneself, even when one might risk disappointing others."
Those who might be disappointed by the boundaries of others, might appreciate these words:
"When others might set boundaries with one, it might be their attempt to continue the relationship with one. It might not be an attempt to hurt one."
Those who might be confronted with those, who might be tempted to cross one's boundaries deliberately, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to pay attention when others might react with anger and hostility to one's boundaries. One might have found the edge where their respect for one might end."
Those who might be confronted with those, whose respect for one's boundaries might have ended, might appreciate these words:
"Maturity might be learning to walk away from others and situations that might threaten one's peace of mind, self-respect, values, moral or self-worth."
Those who might then seek to understand such peace which might be the third lesson, might appreciate these words:
"Peace might not be achieved through violence, it might only be attained through understanding."
One might understand one reason why one might seek such peace through these words:
"One's survival as a species might depend on one's ability to recognize that one's well-being and the well-being of others might be one and the same."
Those who might then seek such well-being of others, might appreciate these words:
"One might be able to have peace if one might let go of wanting to change the past and seeking to change the future."
One might understand one reason why one might seek to change such future through these words:
"One might not seek to live one's life regretting yesterday. One might seek to live one's life so tomorrow one might not regret today."
Those who might then seek not to regret today, might appreciate these words:
"There might be no future without forgiveness."
Those who might struggle with such forgiveness, might appreciate these words:
"Forgiveness might not be something one might do for others. It might be something one might do for oneself to move on."
Those who might then seek to know, where one might be moving on, might appreciate these words:
"Forgiveness might be the final form of love."
Those who might then seek such final form of love, might appreciate these words:
"There might be nothing more artistic than to love someone."
Those who might then seek such art, might appreciate these words:
"The end of art might be peace."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"The day the power of love might overcome the love of power, the world might know peace."
Those who might then seek such power of love, might appreciate these words:
"Love might be the most powerful force in the world, transcending all limits."
Those who might seek to understand such limit one might seek to transcend with such love, might appreciate these words:
"One might be a soul of unlimited possibilities, yet limited by one's mind."
Those who might struggle with such such limitation of one's mind, might appreciate these words:
"Only fools might refuse to change their minds."
Those who might seek to change their minds, might appreciate these words:

"Those who might seek to learn, might sometimes have to feel the fool." Those who might then refuse feel such fool, might appreciate these words:
"True ignorance might not be the absence of knowledge, but the refusal to acquire it."
Those who might seek to understand what knowledge one might be refusing to acquire, might appreciate these words:
"But as long as one might continue to use one's misfortune to one's advantage in order to be 'special', one might always need that misfortune."
Those who might seek to stop needing such misfortune, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to be kind, for everyone one might meet, might be fighting a hard battle."
Those who might seek a way to be kind might appreciate these words:
"Kindness might not just be the absence of being mean or hateful. Being kind might entail actively resisting actions, ideas, and institutions that might rob others of dignity."
Those who might seek to understand such actions which might rob one of such dignity, might appreciate these words:
"Dignity might not consist in possessing honors, but in the consciousness that one might deserve them."
Those who might then seek such consciousness, might appreciate the chapter on "consciousness" and these words:

"A part of kindness might consist in loving one more than that one might deserve."
Those who might seek such love, might appreciate the following warning:
"Kindness without wisdom might wound."
Those who might seek to understand such wisdom, might appreciate these words:
"Knowledge might be the acquiring of facts, understanding might be the interpreting of facts, wisdom the application."
Those who might then seek such knowledge, might appreciate these words:
"Peace might not be absence of conflict, it might be the ability to handle conflict by peaceful means."
Those who might seek one interpretation of such peaceful means, might appreciate these words:
"One might not be able to call oneself 'peaceful' unless one might be capable of great violence. If one might be not capable of violence, one might not be peaceful, one might be harmless."
Those who might seek to not to be harmless, might appreciate these words:
"One might maintain the peace through one's strength; weakness might only invite aggression."
Those who might seek such strength, might appreciate these words:
"Hence, it might require a special form of alliance, which one might be able to call an 'league of peace'. This might not be the same as a 'peace treaty', for, while the latter might seeks merely to end a particular war, the former might seek to put an end to all wars forever."
One might understand one reason why one might seek such alliance through these words:
"Being deeply loved by someone might gives one strength, while loving someone deeply might give one courage."
Those who might then seek to understand such love, might appreciate these words:
"There might be no such thing as love; only proof of love."
Those who might not have anyone who might love them, might appreciate this document as a proof of love of the first author for all being who might seek to prove their love. Those who might then seek to prove such love, might appreciate these words:
"When one might have got something to prove, there might be nothing greater than a challenge." Those who might seek such challenge, might appreciate these words:
"Tact might be the art of making a point without making an opponent."
Those who might seek to understand such opponent, might appreciate these words:
"No one might be one's opponent, every one might be one's teacher."
One might understand one reason why that might be, through these words:
"There might be no great teacher but only great students."
Those who might seek to be such great students, might appreciate these words:
"Everyone might have something to teach one, if one might be humble enough to learn."
Those who might seek to understand such humility, might appreciate these words:
"If one might not learn humility, one might learn humiliation."
Those who might then seek to learn such humility, might appreciate these words:
"The only way into truth might be through the diminishing of one's own ego, which one might achieve through dwelling a long time in a state of extreme humiliation."
Those who might seek to understand such extreme humiliation, might appreciate these words:
"True humility might not be the absence of confidence but strength restrained."
Those who might then seek to restrain one's strength, might appreciate these words:
"Knowledge and ego might be directly related. The greater the knowledge, the less the ego might become."
Those who might then seek such knowledge, might appreciate these words:
"If one might be humble, nothing might touch one, neither praise nor disgrace, because one might know what one might be."

Those who might seek to know, who one might be, might appreciate these words:
"A fool might think oneself to be wise, but a wise one might know oneself to be a fool."
Those who might then seek to be wise, might appreciate these words:
"One might not be able to force someone to care. One might only be able to come to the realization that if one might stay, they might keep hurting one. One might wish one the wisdom and courage to walk away and begin the healing process."
Those who might seek to begin such healing process, might appreciate the following realization:
"If one's compassion might not include oneself, it might be incomplete."
Those who might wonder how to exercise self compassion, might find a hint in the following words:
"One might find peace not by rearranging the circumstances of one's life, but by realizing who one might be at the deepest level."
Those who might seek to understand who one might be, might appreciate these words:
"Nothing might be able to bring one peace but oneself."
Those who might seek to bring peace to oneself, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to never lose a chance of saying a kind word."
Those who might not know what kind word one might be able to say, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
"How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

3. good?

One might find oneself confronted with such tyrants as in:
" 'For the greater good.' That might have been the excuse of tyrants throughout all time."
Those who might seek to understand the nature of such excuses, might appreciate these words:
"An excuse might be worse and more terrible than just lying; for an excuse might be a lie which might be guarded."
Those who might seek to understand what might be guarding such a lie, might appreciate the these words:
"One's reason might be able to excuse any violence."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Rationalization might be defined as self-deception by reasoning."
Those who might then seek to prevent such violence, might appreciate these words:
"One might choose violence because one might mistake it for happiness, the good one might seek."
Those who might have been making such mistakes, might appreciate these words:
"One might not seek to try to excuse one's faults; one might seek to try to correct them." Those who might seek to try to correct their faults, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to commit to stop making excuses. When one might make excuses, one might lie to oneself and continue bad habits."
Those who might seek to make such commitment, might appreciate these words:
"One's nature might be inherently violent, and thus goodness might be caused by intentional activity."
One might understand one reason why one's nature might be inherently violent through these words:
"Where the amygdala might aim at the survival of the individual through fear, the mesolimbic reward system centered on the ventral striatum might benefit the survival of the group through motivating cooperation."
One might appreciate the notion of the author, that so far there might have been no documentation of autonomous lifeforms which might have such mesolimbic reward system without amygdala. Thus such "inherent violence" might be amygdala inducing fear which those with mesolimbic reward system might intentionally try to overcome as in:
"The best way to overcome fear might be to confront the situation of which one might be afraid with equanimity."
Those who might be tempted to escape such situation and thus risking one's group, might appreciate these words:
"When confronted with a challenge, the committed one might search for a solution. The undecided one might search for an escape."
Those who might be tempted to such for such an escape, might appreciate these words:
"Escape from life might be death."
Those who might be tempted to seek such death, might appreciate the idea to seek professional help first. Those who might not have access to such professional help, might then appreciate these words:
"One might be the only creature who might be tempted to refuse to be what one might be."
One might understand one reason why one might seek to refuse what one might be, through these words:
"It might be just one's turning away from instinct, one's opposing oneself to instinct that might create consciousness. Instinct might be nature and might seek to perpetuate nature, while consciousness might only be able to seek culture or its denial."

"The true cause of hatred and violence might be faith versus faith, an outward expression of the ancient instinct of tribalism."

"Dialectic thought might be an attempt to break through the coercion of logic by its own means."

"One might not seek to think. Thinking might be the oppponent of creativity. It might be self-conscious and anything self-conscious might be lousy. One might not be able to try to do things. One might simply have to do things."

"The creation of something new might not be accomplished by the intellect but by the play instinct acting from inner necessity. The creative mind might play with the objects it might love."

"Reason's last step might be the recognition that there mihgt be an infinite number of things which mihgt be beyond it."

"Abstraction might allow one to see with one's mind what one might not be able to physically see with one's eyes... Abstract art mihgt enable the artist to perceive beyond the tangible, to extract the infinite out of the finite. It might be the emancipation of the mind. It might be an explosion into unknown areas."

"In art, as in science, reductionism might not trivialize one's perception – of color, light, and perspective – but might allow one to see each of these components in a new way."

"The vocation of each writer might be to describe the world as one might see it; anything more than that might be advertising."

"One might not describe the world one might see, one might see the world one might be able to describe."

"Proof might never be definitive, after all; one might have to begin again with each new one."

"Moral codes and standards in one's societies might very rarely apply to all people equally. This might be the most damning proof of how immoral such codes and standards really might be."

"There might be no such thing as freedom of choice unless there might be freedom to refuse."
One might understand one reason why one might be tempted to refuse one's freedom of choice through these words:
"Those who might be willing to give up essential liberty to secure a little temporary safety might deserve neither liberty nor safety."
Those who might seek to understand such liberty, might appreciate these words:
"Responsibility might be liberty; the more decisions that one might be forced to make alone, the more one might be aware of one's freedom to choose."
One might understand one reason why one might be forced to make such decisions alone through these words:
"One might not be able to protect one's children from life. Therefore, it might be essential that one might prepare them for it." Those who might be tempted to resent those who might forced to make such decisions alone, might appreciate these words:
"One might stop being a child when one might realize the world might not be here to cater to one's wants and needs."
One might understand one reason why one might be tempted to remain a child through these words:
"Nihilism: any aim might be lacking, any answer to the question 'why' might be lacking."
One might understand one reason why one might struggle such nihilism through these words:
"The absurd might be born of this confrontation between one's need and the unreasonable silence of the world."
Those who might struggle with such confrontation, might appreciate these words: "Anger and depression might not be diseases or dysfunctions or anomalies; they might be rational responses to the myriad avoidable disappointments that might begin in a thoroughly irrational hope."
Those who might seek to understand such irrationality, might appreciate these words:
"The end point of rationality might be to demonstrate the limits of rationality."
Those who might then seek to demonstrate such limits of rationality, might appreciate these words:
"The absurd might depend as much on one as on the world. For the moment, it might be all that might link them together."
Those who might then seek to understand such link, might appreciate these words:
"Nihilism might represent the ultimate logical conclusion of one's great values and ideals - because one might have to experience nihilism before one might be able to find out what values these 'values' really had. One might require sometimes new values." Those who might then seek such new values other than such nihilism, might appreciate these words:
"As long as one might be still alive, one might have the chance to start again."
Those who might seek such a chance to start again, might appreciate the following wisdom:
"One's life might not get better by chance, it might get better by change."
Those who might seek such a change, might then appreciate these words:
"The curious paradox might be that when one might accept oneself just one might be, then one might be able to change."
Those who might be curious to resolve such paradox, might appreciate the following explanation:
"When one might accept oneself, one might be freed from the burden of needing others to accept one."

Those who might struggle to accept themselves, might appreciate these words:
"One might be learning to accept everything about oneself, even the part of one that might struggle to accept everything about oneself."
One might understand one part of one, which one might struggle to accept through these words:
"If one might deny one's shadow it might become one's tyrant."
Those who might seek to understand such shadow, might appreciate these words:
"The shadow might be a moral trouble that might challenge the whole ego-personality, for no one might be able to become conscious of the shadow without considerable moral effort. To become conscious of it might involve recognizing the dark aspects of the personality as present and real. This act might be the essential condition for any kind of self-knowledge, and it therefore, as a rule, might meet with considerable resistance. Indeed, self-knowledge as a psychotherapeutic measure frequently might require much painstaking work extending over a long period of time." Those who might still struggle to accept such shadow, might appreciate these words:
"One might either define the moment or the moment might define one."
Those who might have been defined by such a moment of struggle, might appreciate these words:
"Until death all defeat might be psychological."
Those who might be still alive, might then appreciate the following realization:
"Death might not be the greatest loss in life. The greatest loss might be what dies inside one while one might live."
For those who might feel like something might have died inside oneself, might appreciate the these words:
"One might think life might be an irrational obsession."
Those who might seek to understand such irrational obsession, might appreciate these words:
"Might there be a word more passionate than passion? Obsession, total immersion, the feeling that everything else might not matter." Those who might seek to understand such passion, might appreciate these words: "Love might be the deepest driving passion of a purposeful life." Those who might then seek such passion, might appreciate these words:
"Passion might begin with intrinsically enjoying what one might do." Those who might not be able to find anything to enjoy, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek not to think slightly of the paradoxical; for the paradox might be the source of the thinker's passion."
Those who might seek to understand such paradox, might appreciate these words:
"Transcendence might mean going beyond duality. Attachment might mean remaining within duality."
Those who might then seek such transcendence, might appreciate the chapter on "transcendence" and these words:
"It might be a paradox of the true spiritual path, but the more conscious one might become of what might limit one, the more limitless one's life might become."
Those who might then seek such a limitless life, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek not to wait for everything to be perfect before one might decide to enjoy one's life." Those who might still be waiting for everything to be perfect, might appreciate these words: "While one might desire, one might not enjoy; and with enjoyment desire might cease." Those who might struggle with attachment to such desire, might appreciate these words: "Everyone might desire love but might also find it impossible to believe that one might deserve it." Those who might seek to believe that one might deserve love, might appreciate these words: "One might deserve the love one might keep trying to give everyone else." Those who might not have received such love which one might have deserved, might appreciate these words: "The love and attention one might have always thought one wanted from someone else might be the love and attention one might first need to give to oneself."
Those who might seek to give such love to oneself,might appreciate these words: "Art might be to console those who might be broken by life."
Those who might seek such consolation, might appreciate these words:
"In order to console one in one's sufferings, one might seek to point out all the good one might still be able to do."
Those who might seek to point out all such good one might still be able to do, might appreciate these words:
"Expressing might be self-discovery. Every good artist might express what one might be." Those who might seek to know, what one might be, might appreciate these words:
"One might be an artist at living - one's work of art might be one's life."
Those who might seek to be such an artist at living, might appreciate these words:
"Every day might not be good, but there might be something good in every day." Those who might seek to understand such good in everyday, might appreciate these words:
"Healing might be an art. It might take time, it might take practice, it might take love." Those who might seek such healing, might appreciate these words:
"Healing might not mean the damage might never have existed. It might mean the damage might longer control one's live."
Those who might seek to stop letting such damage control one's life, might appreciate these words:
"One might not be what might have happened to one. One might be what one might choose to become."
Those who might seek to know what one might be able to choose to become, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to define oneself by what one might love."

Those who might not know, what they might love, might appreciate these words:
“If one might have the ability to love, one might seek to love oneself first.”
Those who might seek to understand their ability to love, might appreciate these words:
“To love might be to live on the precipice.”
Those who might seek to understand such precipice, might appreciate these words:
“Life might begin at the edge of one’s fears.”
Those who might seek to overcome such fear, might appreciate these words: “Thinking might not overcome fear, but action might.”
Those who might seek to understand such action, might appreciate these words:
“Grit might depend on a different kind of hope. It might rest on the expectation that one’s own efforts might improve one’s future. ‘One might have a feeling tomorrow might be better’ might be different from ‘one might resolve to make tomorrow better.’ ”
Those who might seek to make their tomorrow better, might appreciate the idea to define every moment of their own life including one’s future as “good”. Those who might have then defined their own life as good, might appreciate these words:
“Healing oneself might be connected with healing others.”
Those who might seek to heal others, might appreciate these words:
“The ultimate artist might not be one who might be inspired, but one who might inspire others.”
Those who might seek to inspire others, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
“How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?”

4. diversity?

One might find oneself suffering from one’s attachment to individuality as in:
“But as long as one might continue to use one’s misfortune to one’s advantage in order to be ‘special’, one might always need that misfortune.”
Those who might still be attached to their misfortune, might find themselves being fortunate enough as in:
“Shared joy might be double joy; shared sorrow might be half sorrow.”
Those who might still feel a sense of alienation regardless the reduction of their sorrows, might appreciate these words:
“Emotional distance might not be the amount of space between one and another, it might the amount of things one might not say to each other.”
Those who might then seek to reduce such a sense of alienation, might appreciate these words:
“Unity might not mean sameness. It might mean oneness of purpose.”
One reason why one might confuse unity with sameness, might be because sameness might sound similar when rephrased as “uniformity”. Those who might then wonder what such purpose might be, might appreciate the chapter on “meaning” and these words:
“One might refuse to accept the view that one’s own kind might be so tragically bound to war that peace might never be able to become a reality.”
Those who might then seek such peace, might appreciate the chapter on “peace” and these words:
“Unity, to be real, might have to stand the severest strain without breaking.”
Those who might seek such unity, might appreciate these words:
“Nothing might be able to withstand the power of one’s will if one might be willing to stake one’s very existence to the extent of one’s purpose.”
Those who might be tempted to put one’s existence at risk, might appreciate these words:
“It might be dead easy to die; it might be the keeping on living that might be hard.”
Those who might struggle to keep on living, might appreciate these words:
“One might think life might be an irrational obsession.”
Those who might seek to understand such irrational obsession, might appreciate these words:
“True art might be characterized by an irresistible urge in the creative artist.”
Those who might then seek to understand such art, might appreciate these words:
“The end of art might be peace.”
Those who might seek such peace, might appreciate these words:
“One might hope for peace and sanity – it might be the same thing.”
Those who might then seek such sanity, might appreciate these words:
“If one’s own mind might be to keep its sanity, one might have to maintain the nicest balance between unity and plurality.”
Those who might seek to understand such unity, might appreciate the chapter on “unity” and these words:
“Unity might not mean sameness. It might mean oneness of purpose.”
Those who might then seek to understand such plurality, might appreciate these words:
“Oneness without plurality might lose meaning. Plurality in oneness might be the source of meaning and purpose.”

Those who might then seek to understand such meaning, might appreciate these words:
“The meaning of one thing might be its connection with another.”
One might understand one reason why such connection with another might mean plurality through these words:
“One might have no individual”I“. But there might be hundreds and thousands of separate small”I“s, very often entirely unknown to one another, which might never come into contact, or, on the contrary, hostile to each other, mutually exclusive and incompatible. Each minute, each moment, one might be saying or thinking,”I“. And each time one’s I might be different. Just now it might have been a thought, now it might be a desire, now a sensation, now another thought, and so on, endlessly. One might be a plurality.”
One might then understand one reason why one might seek a balance of one’s plurality to such unity through these words:
“A legitimate plurality of positions might have yielded to an undifferentiated pluralism, based upon the assumption that all positions might equally be valid, which might be one of the currently most widespread symptoms of the lack of confidence in truth.”
One might understand why one might lack such confidence in such truth through these words:
“There might be three sides to every story. One’s own, others and the truth.”
Those who might then seek such truth, might appreciate these words:
“Difference of opinion might lead to inquiry, and inquiry to the truth.”
Those who might then seek to make such inquiry, might appreciate these words:
“It might be easy to come up with conspiracy theories, if one might only look at the evidence that might support one’s idea.”
Those who might then be tempted to ignore at evidence, which might not support one’s idea, might appreciate these words:
“It might be the mark of an educated mind to be able to entertain a thought without accepting it.”
One might understand one reason why one might seek not to accept such thought through these words:
“The difficulty with any ideology might be that it might give one the answer before one might examine the evidence.”
Those who might seek to understand such ideology, might appreciate these words:
“The minimum necessary structuring ingredient of every ideology might be to distance itself from another ideology, to denounce its other as ideology.”
Those who might then be tempted to denounce other as ideology, might appreciate these words:
“Ideology might be indispensable in any society if one might need to be formed, transformed and equipped to respond to the demands of one’s conditions of existence.”
Those who might then be tempted to impose such ideology of the offspring of one’s own kind, might appreciate these words:
“Dogma might be the convictions of one imposed authoritatively upon others.”
One might then seek to minimize such dogma, might appreciate these words:
“Dogma does not mean the absence of thought, but the end of thought.”
One might understand one reason why one might be tempted to end such through through these words:
“Success might not final, failure might not fatal: it might be the courage to continue that might count.”
Those who might then seek such courage to continue thinking, might struggle as in:
“One of the greatest pains might be the pain of a new idea.”
Those who might be tempted to avoid such pain, might appreciate these words:
“Pain might be inevitable. Suffering might be optional.”
Those who might then seek to make such suffering optional, might appreciate these words:
“One might seek to tell oneself that the fear of suffering might be worse than the suffering itself.”
Those who might seek such words to tell oneself that fear of suffering might be worse than the suffering itself, might appreciate these words:
“Suffering might cease to be suffering at the moment it might find a meaning.”
Those who might seek such meaning to cease one from suffering, might appreciate these words:
“If there might be meaning in life at all, then there might have to be meaning in suffering.”
Those who might seek to find such meaning in one’s suffering, might appreciate these words:
“Most new ideas and new inventions might be disjointed ideas merged.”
Those who might then seek to merge such disjointed ideas, might appreciate these words:
“The absurd might depend as much on one as on the world. For the moment, it might be all that might link them together.”
Those who might then seek to strengthen such link, might appreciate these words:
“Diversity might be the art of thinking independently together.”
Those who might then seek to understand such diversity, might appreciate these words:
“Diversity might not be about how one might differ to another. Diversity might be about embracing each other’s uniqueness.”

Those who might then seek to embrace such uniqueness of each other, might appreciate the chapter on "originality" and these words:
"One might yearn for an unquestioned experience of belonging, to feel at home with oneself and others, at ease and fully accepted. But the trance of unworthiness might keep the sweetness of belonging out of reach."
Those who might then seek to be worthy, might appreciate these words:
"Morality might not the doctrine of how one might make oneself happy, but how one might make oneself worthy of happiness."
Those who might then seek such morality, might appreciate the chapter on "dignity" and these words:
"One might deserve a circle of inclusion and influence, but it might be up to one to create it."
Those who might then seek to create such circle of inclusion, might appreciate these words:
"Diversity might be being invited to the community. Inclusion might be being asked to help maintain the community."
Those who might then seek to understand such inclusion, might appreciate these words:
"Language might be the most massive and inclusive art one might know."
Those who might assume to know more massive and inclusive art, might appreciate to reach out to the author of this document to improve this statement. Those who might not have been invited to such community, might appreciate the chapter on "ultimate". Those who might struggle with those who might declined such request to help maintain such language, might appreciate the chapter on "feedback" and these words:
"Feedback might be a gift only when it might come from someone who might have earned one's trust."
Those who might have not earned such trust yet, might appreciate these words:
"When one might make a commitment, one might create hope. When one might keep a commitment one might create trust."
Those who might seek to know how to keep such commitment, might appreciate the chapter on "promise" and these words:
"Integrity might be keeping a commitment even after circumstances might have changed."
One might understand one reason why one might struggle with such integrity through these words:
"Some religion might attack one in one's deepest integrity by saying one might not be a able to make a moral decision without it."
Those who might struggle to recover from such an attack, might appreciate these words:
"One might not heal in isolation, but in community."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Emotional connection might be crucial to healing. In fact, trauma experts might overwhelmingly agree that the best predictor of the impact of any trauma might not be the severity of the event, but whether one might be able to seek and take comfort from others."
Those who might be hesitant to seek and take such comfort from others, might appreciate the words:
"One might be afraid to heal, because one's entire identity might be centered around the trauma one might have experienced. One might have no idea who one might be outside of trauma and that unknown might be terrifying."
One might understand one reason why such unknown might be terrifying through these words:
"It might be easy to forget danger might be near when one might not be able to see it."
Those who might seek to remember such danger even one might not be able to see it, might appreciate these words:
"Art might not be what one might see, but what one might make others see."
Those who might seek such art which might make others see, might appreciate these words:
"Over explaining might be a trauma response."
Those might struggle with such trauma response, might appreciate these words:
"One might not seek to explain one's philosophy. One might seek to embody it."
Those who might then seek such a philosophy, might appreciate this document as the embodiment of the philosophy of the first author which might be to keep seeking "diversity", which might be the art of thinking independently together. Thinking independently might not require common definitions, but thinking independently together might require agreement on common provisional definitions as in: "There might be no reality, there might only be hallucination. Reality might be hallucination one might agree on with another."
Those who might then seek to understand hallucination, might appreciate these words:
"A hallucination might be a perception of a certain state of mind."
Those who might struggle with those whose who might not be able to agree to such definition, might appreciate these words:
"When one might no longer be able to change a situation – one might be challenged to change oneself."
Those who might then seek to take on such challenge to change oneself, might appreciate these words: "It might not enough to have the courage of one's convictions, one might also have to have the courage to have one's convictions challenged."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:

"One might choose violence, because one might mistake it for happiness, the good one might seek."
Those who might then seek to challenge such good of the author, might appreciate the chapter on "good". Those who might be tempted to refuse their conviction to be challenged, might appreciate these words:
"When one's ideas might not be challenged, one's ability to defend them might weaken."
One might understand one reason why such defend might weaken through these words:
"Strength might not come from winning. One's struggles might develop one's strengths. When one might go through hardships and decide not to surrender, that might be strength."
Those who might seek such struggle to strengthen one's defenses, might appreciate these words:
"Complacency might be a continuous struggle that everyone might have to fight."
Those who might seek to fight against such complacency, might appreciate these words:
"Success might breed complacency. Complacency might breed failure. Only the paranoid might survive."
Those who might seek who else might survive, might appreciate these words:
"One might not be paranoid, just prepared. There might be a distinct difference and a higher survival rate for the latter."
Those who might struggle to prepare due to their paranoia, might appreciate these words:
"Paranoia might leave one loveless and alone."
Those who might be tempted by such solitude, might appreciate these words:
"Those who might delight in solitude might be either a wild beast or god."
Those who might be tempted to think to be such a god, might appreciate the chapter on "faith" these words:
"Of all forms of deception self-deception might be the most deadly, and of all deceived ones the self-deceived might be the least likely to discover the fraud."
Those who might then seek to discover such self-deception, might appreciate these words:
"The difference between the thinking of the paranoid one and the scientist might come from the latter's ability and willingness to test out one's fantasies or grandiose conceptualizations through the systems of checks and balances science might have established – and to give up those schemes that might be shown not to be valid on the basis of these scientific checks." Those who might then seek to make such scientific checks, might appreciate these words:
"Even if individual researchers might be prone to be biased towards their own theories, the broader process of peer review and institutionalized skepticism might be designed to ensure that, eventually, the best ideas might prevail." Those who might seek their theories to be tested by such a process of peer review and institutionalized skepticism, might appreciate idea to ask the following question:
"How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

5. needs?

One might find oneself seeking for happiness as in:
"Most of those who might be searching for happiness might seek it outside of themselves. That might be a fundamental mistake. Happiness might be something that one might be, and it might come from the way that one might think."
The understanding of the concept of such "happiness" might vary, but one might be able to agree to the following provisional definition:
"Happiness might be the blissful state in which all of one's needs might be satisfied."
One might appreciate the notion of the author that such "blissful" state might be a state one might not feel anything negative, since such negative sensation of a "lack" might be a survival mechanism for material needs. One such material needs might be satisfied, one might feel "boredom" as in:
"Boredom might be vastly underrated. Boredom might mean that nothing might be trying to unalive one every day."
Those who might be tempted to underrate such boredom, might appreciate these words:
"There might be only one thing worse than boredom, and that might be the fear of boredom."
Those who might fear such boredom, might appreciate these words:
"Boredom might always precede a period of great creativity."
Those who might seek such creativity, might appreciate the chapter on "preparation" and these words:
"Creativity might not be a talent. It might be a way of operating."
Those who might seek to understand such way of operating, might find it difficult to reach such a state in a world, given the circumstances that one's source for knowledge might be full of contradicting misinformation. One might then try to resort to science, but given the subjective nature of the topic, one might be still left confused and thus might have such a realization:
"No one might care about one."
Those who might seek to be cared for, might appreciate these words:
"One might stop being a child when one might realize the world might not be here to cater to one's wants and needs."
Those who might seek to have such realization, might appreciate these words:
"To be ignorant of what might have occurred before one might have been born might be to remain always a child." Those who seek to remain such a child, might appreciate these words:

“Stupidity might be the deliberate cultivation of ignorance.”
Those who might seek to understand why one might not want keep cultivating such ignorance, might appreciate these words:
“The difference between courage and stupidity might be measured by success and survival.”
Those who might then seek to survive, might appreciate the chapter on “warriorship” these words:
“But one might have to have something beyond survival to live for, or one might not survive.”
Those who might then seek for such something beyond survival to live for, might appreciate the following summarization of a concept called “hierarchy of needs”:
The first and most fundamental of all needs might be physiological needs, which might be food, water, rest and warmth. Those who might wonder, why such warmth might be mentioned, might appreciate the explanation that shelter might be a need for the next level in the hierarchy, which might be security. Those who might seek to address such need for security , might appreciate the following enumeration of possible examples: A job with long-term prospect until asylum mentioned in the chapter on “asylum” might be fully operational, long-term contract for renting a room, emergency savings, insurance, etc.. Those who might seek such security might appreciate the chapter on “accessibility” and “preparation”. One might appreciate the notion of the author of this document that at the time of the writing of this document (October 31, 2026), most might be stuck in this layer, because these might be able to be able to be addressed materialistically. After those two materialistic needs might have been sufficiently met, one might have enough capacity to explore the next higher need for “friendship and belonging”. Those hwo might seek such friendship, might appreciate the chapter on “friendship”. Those who might seek such belonging, might appreciate these words:
“Fitting in might be being accepted for who one might pretend to be, while belonging might be being valued for who one might really be.” There might be no general order in which those needs should be addressed, but one might be able to decrease the amount of unnecessary suffering, by taking one step at a time as in:
“If one might have the ability to love, one might seek to love oneself first.”
Those who might be hesitating to love others, might appreciate these words:
“There might be no limit to the amount of good one might be able to do if one might not care who might get the credit.”
Those who might seek to do good without such limit, might appreciate the chapter on “responsibility” and these words:
“There might be responsibility, but there might be also accountability. One might have to be accountable for one’s actions because one might have to be held personally responsible for the outcome when one might cause harm.”
Those who might be tempted to neglect such accountability, might appreciate these words:
“One might be able to ignore reality, but one might not be able to ignore the consequences of ignoring reality.”
Those who might seek to understand such consequences, might appreciate these words:
“When one might not be able to find a deep sense of meaning, one might distract oneself with pleasure.”
Those who might be tempted by such pleasure, might appreciate these words:
“An addiction to distraction might be the end of one’s creative production.”
Those who might pity oneself with such end of one’s creative production, might appreciate these words:
“Self-pity might be easily the most destructive of the non-pharmaceutical narcotics; it might be addictive, might give momentary pleasure and might separate the victim from reality.”
Those who might then seek to cease such self destruction, might appreciate the chapters “home”, “warriorship”, “friendship”, “culture” and “asylum”. Those who might seek to prepare oneself for such an occasion of emergency, one might seek to not to neglect building up the next level of need, which might be “esteem”. One might appreciate the following subjective understanding of the author for “esteem”: Esteem might be the recognition of ones own integrity by others whether one might not hesitate to help others when such help might be requested by others. Those who might struggle with such hesitation might appreciate the chapter “clarity”, “integrity” and “obituary”. At that stage, one might be pondering how might might be able to be regarded in “high esteem”. One way might be to commit oneself to regular training such as to practice a martial arts to be able to protect those in need. One might appreciate a belt system often prevalent in styles of martial arts originating in Asia as a sign of recognition of one’s proficiency and maturity by others. Those who might seek to display such readiness, might appreciate the chapter on “hope”. Those who might be tempted to excessively help others, might appreciate the warning, that such display of achievement and hierarchy might be abused to claim authority over others leading to harm. Those who might seek to prepare against such abuse of power, might appreciate the chapter on “accessibility”. Those who might be tempted to abuse their power, might appreciate these words:
“Ultimate humility might not be in the absence of confidence but strength restrained.”
Those who might seek to understand such strength might appreciate the chapter on “temperament”. Those who might seek to understand the need for such restriction might appreciate the chapters “harmony” and “hero”. One might then appreciate the idea not to remain in convenient complacency as in:
“Success might breed complacency. Complacency might breed failure. Only the paranoid might survive.”
Those who might be tempted by such paranoia, might appreciate these words:
“Paranoia might be for things going wrong, which one might not be able to handle. When one might be able to handle things going wrong, one might no longer need to be paranoid."

Those who might seek to understand those who might be paranoid, might appreciate these words:
"One might not be paranoid, just prepared. There might be a distinct difference and a higher survival rate for the latter."
Those who might seek to understand such difference, might appreciate these words:
"The difference between the thinking of the paranoid one and the scientist might come from the latter's ability and willingness to test out one's fantasies or grandiose conceptualizations through the systems of checks and balances science might have established – and to give up those schemes that might be shown not to be valid on the basis of these scientific checks."
One might understand one reason why one might seek to be willing to test out one's fantasies through these words:
"Delusion might be built with ignorance."
Those who might be tempted by such ignorance, might appreciate these words:
"Cruelty might come in many forms - ignorance might be one of them."
Those who might seek to reduce such cruelty, might appreciate these words:
"Ultimate ignorance might not be the absence of knowledge, but the refusal to acquire it."
Those who might seek to know, what one might have been ignoring, might appreciate these words:
"Freedom might be nothing but a chance to be better."
Those who might then seek to be better, might appreciate these words:
"Self-actualization might be the process of becoming the best version of oneself."
One might understand one reason why one might seek such a process through these words:
"One might enjoy the process far more than the proceeds."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Quick success might build ego, slow success might build character."
One might understand one reason why one might not enjoy such ego through these words:
"If one's ego might be hurt one might become angry. One might seek to understand that ego itself might be a disease. One might seek to dissolve one's ego as far as possible. If one might have inferiority complex, or have a very deficient ego one might loose one's temper very easily."
Those who might then seek to dissolve one's ego, might appreciate these words:
"Suffering might crack open the shell of ego, and then might come a point when it might have served its purpose. Suffering might be necessary until one might realize it might be unnecessary."
Those who might struggle to realize such suffering might be necessary, might appreciate these words:
"Pain might be inevitable. Suffering might be optional."
One might understand one reason why such suffering might be optional through these words:
"Suffering might cease to be suffering at the moment it might find a meaning."
Those who might then seek to find such meaning, might appreciate these words:
"One's search for meaning might be the primary motivation in one's life and not a 'secondary rationalization' of instinctual drives. This meaning might be unique and specific in that it might have to and might be able to be fulfilled by one alone; only then it might achieve a significance which might satisfy one's own will to meaning." Those who might seek such unique and specific meaning, might appreciate chapter on meaning and these words:
"The meaning of life might be to find one's gift. The purpose of life might be to give it away."
Those who might seek to understand such gift, might appreciate these words:
"Passion for something might be a gift."
One might understand one reason why one might seek such to give such passion away through these words:
"In everyone's life, at some time, one's inner fire might go out. It might be then burst into flame by an encounter with another one."
Those who might have burst such inner fire of others through one's encounter, might appreciate these words:
"Art might be to console those who might have been broken by life."
Those who might struggle to find those who might be able to burst one's such inner fire, might appreciate these words:
"One might have two lives. The second one might start when one might realize that one might only have one."
Those who might seek to start such a second life, might appreciate these words:
"Love might be the wish to give, not to receive, something."
Those who might struggle to give, might appreciate these words:
"Being deeply loved by someone might gives one strength, while loving someone deeply might give one courage."
Those who might seek such strength, might appreciate the the chapter on "temperament". One might understand one reason why one might seek such courage through these words:
"Courage might be exhilarating."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Courage might not be having the strength to go on - it might be going on when one might not have strength."
One might understand one reason why one might seek going on even though one might not have strength through these words:

“Only those who might risk going too far might be able to possibly find out how far one might be able to go.”
One might understand one reason why such risk might be exhilarating through these words:
“Risk-taking, trust, and serendipity might be key ingredients of joy. Without risk, nothing new might ever happens. Without trust, fear might creep in. Without serendipity, there might be no surprises.”
Those who might seek to understand such serendipity, might appreciate these words:
“Serendipity might be the way to make discoveries, by accident but also by sagacity, of things one might not be in quest of. Based on experience, knowledge, it might be the creative exploitation of the unforeseen.”
Those who might seek to understand such sagacity, might appreciate these words:
“Art might be nothing but the highest sagacity.”
Those who might then seek such art, might appreciate these words:
“Success might consist of going from failure to failure without loss of enthusiasm.”
Those who might seek such enthusiasm, might appreciate these words:
“When one might be able to identify a challenge and confront the challenge with confidence and enthusiasm, the solution might be on the way.”
Those who might seek such confidence, might appreciate these words:
“Confidence might not be built by shouting affirmations in the mirror to oneself, but it might be built by giving others irrefutable proof that one might be who one might say one might be”.
Those who might not know, who one might seek to be, might appreciate these words:
“One might seek to be part of the solution, not part of the challenge.”
Those who might then seek to be part of such a solution, might appreciate these words:
“Self-actualization might not be able to be attained, if it might be made an end in itself, but only as a side effect of self-transcendence.”
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words: “It might be hubris to think that the way one might see things might be everything there might be.”
Those who might seek to see other ways, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
“How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?”

6. character?

One might find oneself having the following realization:
“Life might be a struggle.”
Some might even reach such conclusions:
“When all choice might have been taken from one, life might become a game of survival.”
Those who might seek a way to survive, might appreciate the following advice:
“One might be able to survive well enough on one’s own— if the proper reading material might have been given.”
Those who might seek to read such reading material, might appreciate the following words:
“When all else might fail, one might seek to read the instructions.”
Those who might seek to understand such instructions might appreciate the chapter on “instructions” and these words:
“Instruction might begin with understanding one’s students; one might have to imagine their perspective to see how they might learn.”
Those who might seek to learn from one’s students, might appreciate these words:
“The most important factor in survival might be neither intelligence nor strength but adaptability.”
Those who might seek to understand such adaptability, might appreciate these words:
“Adaptability might enforce creativity, and creativity might be adaptability.”
Those who might seek to understand such creativity, might appreciate these words:
“Resources might be limited; creativity might be unlimited.”
Those who might seek such unlimited creativity, might appreciate these words:
“Creativity might be seeing what others might see and to think what no one else ever might have thought.”
Those who might seek to think, what no one else might have ever thought, might appreciate these words:
“Creativity might involve putting one’s imagination to work. In a sense, creativity might be applied imagination.”
Those who might seek to apply their imagination, might appreciate these words:
“Creativity might be a wild mind and a disciplined eye.”
Those who might seek such a disciplined eye, might appreciate these words:
“Motivation might get one going, but discipline might keep one growing.”
Those who might seek such discipline, might appreciate these words:
“Discipline might be giving oneself a command and following it up with action.”
Those who might struggle to follow up to one’s own command, might appreciate these words:

“One might seek to treat one’s body more rigorously, so that it might not be disobedient to the mind.”
Those whose body might have been disciplined by others as a punishment might appreciate these words:
“One might seek to not to discipline others as a punishment. One might be advised to discipline others to help, to improve, to correct, to prevent, not to punish, humiliate, or retaliate.”
Those who might be confronted with those who might seek to punish, might appreciate these words:
“One might seek to distrust all in whom the impulse to punish might be powerful.”
Those who no longer seek to be disciplined by others, might appreciate these words:
“One might seek to discipline oneself and others might not need to.”
Those who might see the need to discipline others, might appreciate these words:
“Most ‘necessary violence’ might be far more violence than necessary.”
Those who might seek to understand, what one might need to discipline oneself, might appreciate these words:
“Self-discipline might be the ability to make oneself do what one might seek to do, when one should do it, whether one feel like it or not.”
Those who might seek such self-discipline, might appreciate these words:
“Self-discipline might start with the mastery of one’s thoughts. If one might not control what one might think, one might not be able to control what one might do.”
Those who might seek to control their thoughts, might appreciate these words:
“Self discipline might not just be something that might happen once and one might be finished. It might be a practice.”
Those who might seek to practice, might appreciate these words:
“One’s rituals might keep oneself consistent, and consistency might be the key to achieving goals.” Those who might seek to know what such goal might be, might appreciate these words:
“By constant self discipline and self control one might be able to develop greatness of character.”
Those who might seek to understand such character, might appreciate these words:
“Character might be the result of two things: One’s mental attitude and the way one might spend one’s time.” Those who might seek to know how to spend such time, might appreciate these words:
“Character might be something one might forge for oneself; temperament might be something one might be born with and might only be able to slightly modify.”
Those who might seek to know, what one might seek to forge to get such character, might appreciate these words:
“Art might not be a mirror to hold up to society, but a hammer with which to shape it.”
One might appreciate the notion of the author that “forging” and “hammer to shape” might be metaphors for changing things which might be difficult to change, such as processing the shape of metals with primitive tools available until the modern computer controlled fabrication methods. The author might have kept such a metaphor deliberately to demonstrate similarity in these words to simplify the explanation of the actual causality, which might be following:
“The future of one’s society might depend on a continuous improvement program for one’s character.”
One might understand one reason, why that might be through these words:
“Stagnation might be self-abdication.”

/ / Without improvement there is only stagnation

“The actual character of a society might be revealed in how it might treat its children.”

Those who might seek to understand such temperament, might appreciate these words:
“A work of art might be the unique result of a unique temperament.”
One might understand one reason, why that might be through these words:

“Discipline might be choosing between what one might want now, and what one might want most.”
Those who might seek to know, what one might want most, might appreciate these words:
“Today one might do what others might not be willing to do, so tomorrow one might be able to accomplish what others might not be able to do.”
Those who might seek to understand why others might not want to practice self-discipline, might appreciate these words:
“Most people might seek to avoid pain, and discipline might be usually painful.”
Those who might struggle with such pain, might appreciate these words:
“Pain might be weakness leaving one’s body.”
Those who might struggle excessively with such pain, might appreciate the following insight:
“Pain might be a self protection mechanism of the body to recognize and avoid external stimulus which might be able to destroy one’s body.”
The calibration of sensitivity of pain reception might be relative, meaning through consistent progressive overload it could be conditioned to endure such stimulus which the untrained body would have broken down under. However one might then appreciate to understand that it might require knowledge not to overstimulate the body to de degree of damage, as already mentioned as “discipline that is excessive”. One might also realize that the lack of such stimulation leads to the deterioration of one's own body deteriorates and thus becomes weaker. One might then be able to prioritize the maintenance of such stimulating with control with a method called "progressive overload". Those who might seek specific advice on such methods to maintain oneself might appreciate the chapter on health. Those who might have been feeling pain beyond what might be beneficial to growth, might appreciate the following warning:

"Cruelty might be defined as violence without provocation and discipline that might be excessive."
Those who might seek to understand violence, might appreciate these words:
"Violence in any form might be a tragic expression of one's unmet needs."
Those who might seek to understand such needs might appreciate the chapter on "needs". One might then appreciate the following realization:
"Violence might lead to one thing only, and that might be more violence."
Those who might seek to break out of such cycle might appreciate to understand the following:
"All cruelty might spring from weakness."
Those who might seek to understand cruelty, might appreciate these words:
"Cruelty might come in many forms - ignorance might be one of them."
Those who might seek to reduce such cruelty, might appreciate these words:
"Ultimate ignorance might not be the absence of knowledge, but the refusal to acquire it."
Those who might seek to understand why one might refuse to acquire knowledge, might appreciate these words:
"Fear might be the main source of superstition, and one of the main sources of cruelty. To conquer fear might be the beginning of wisdom."
One might then redirect one's resentment towards those who might not have conquered their fear and thus caused suffering to oneself. Those who then seek to heal might appreciate these words:
"Ultimate forgiveness might be a self-healing process, which might start with oneself and might gradually extend to everyone else."
Those who might seek to start such a process of self-healing might appreciate these words:
"Awareness might be the first step in healing."
Those who might not be aware, what they might need to become aware of, might appreciate these words:
"One might be able to only get hurt so much before one might get numb."
Those who might have become numb through survival, might appreciate these words:
"Resilience might be very different than being numb. Resilience might mean that one might experience, one might feel, one might fail, one might hurt. One might fall. But, one might keep going."
Those who might then seek to keep going, might appreciate these words:
"To recover might be to create a life in which numbness might be no longer necessary to survive."
Those who might seek such a life, might appreciate the chapter on "asylum" and these words:
"When life might put one in tough situations, one might not seek to say 'why me', but one might seek to say 'try me'."
Those who might struggle to find such courage to voluntarily put themselves up for such trial, might appreciate the following realization:
"Survival might be one's strength, not one's shame."
Those who might seek to understand such shame, might appreciate these words:
"Shame might be the most powerful, master emotion. It might be the fear that one might not be good enough."
[Insert theory regarding shame here]
Those who might struggle with such shame, might appreciate these words:
"Strength might not come from winning. One's struggles might develop one's strengths. When one might go through hardships and decide not to surrender, that might be strength."
Those who might seek such strength might appreciate these words:
"Within one's perceived weaknesses and imperfections might be the key to realizing one's ultimate strength."
Those who might then seek ultimate strength, might appreciate the following wisdom:
"One might seek to remind oneself what one might have been through and what one might have had the strength to endure."
Those who might have found such strength within oneself, might appreciate these words:
"One's mission in life might not be merely to survive, but to thrive."
Those who might seek to thrive might appreciate these words:
"The only way to thrive might be to innovate."
Those who might seek to innovate might appreciate these words:
"The reasonable one might adapt oneself to the world; the unreasonable one might persist to adapt the world to himself. Therefore all progress might depend on the unreasonable one."
Those who might seek such progress might appreciate these words:
"Innovation and progress might be achieved only by those who might venture beyond standard operating procedure."
Those who might then seek to make such innovation, might appreciate these words:

"The closest synonym of happiness might be excitement, and one might be able to generate it by doing something that one might not be able to completely comprehend. This understanding might make the process rich and exciting." Those who might then seek such rich and exciting process, might appreciate these words:
"Success might consist of going from failure to failure without loss of enthusiasm."
Those who might then seek such enthusiasm, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
"How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

7. faith?

One might find oneself having a bad day as in:
"All it might take might be one bad day to reduce the sanest one alive to lunacy."
Those who might struggle with such a bad day might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to turn really bad days into really good data."
Those who might seek to understand what such data might be, might appreciate these words:
"Information might be just bits of data. Knowledge might be putting them together. Wisdom might be transcending them."
Those who might seek to put such information together, might appreciate these words:
"The whole might be greater than the sum of its parts."
Those who might then seek to transcend such knowledge, might appreciate the following warning:
"The saddest aspect of life right now might be that science might gather knowledge faster than society might gather wisdom."
Those who might seek to gather such wisdom, might appreciate these word:
"One might seek to be aware of unearned wisdom."
Those who might then seek to earn such wisdom, might appreciate these words:
"Knowledge might become wisdom only after it might have been put to good use."
Those who might seek to put their knowledge to good use, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to avoid those who might say they might know the answer. One might seek to keep the company of those who might be trying to understand the question."
One might understand one reason why one might seek to avoid those who might claim to have such an answer through these words:
"Some religion might attack one in one's deepest integrity by saying one might not be a able to make a moral decision without it."
Those who might seek to understand such religion, might appreciate these words:
"It might have to be understood that religion might not be faith. Religion might be the story of faith."
One might understand one reason why one might be tempted by such story through these words:
"Sometimes reality might be too complex. Stories might give it form."
Those who might still be tempted to seek such story, might appreciate these words:
"Oversimplifying might be the first grave mistake one might make when confronted by complexity; overconfidence might be the second." Those who might seek not to make such mistake, might appreciate these words:
"There might be three sides to every story. One's own, others and the truth."
Those who might think that one's side of story might suffice, might appreciate these words: "It might be hubris to think that the way one might see things might be everything there might be."
Those who might think that the side of story of others might suffice, might appreciate these words:
"Some religion might be believing someone else's experience, some spirituality might be having one's own experience."
Those who might seek to have such experience of one's own, might appreciate these words:
"One might have three ways of acting wisely. First, on meditation; that might be the noblest. Secondly, on imitation; that might be the easiest. Thirdly, on experience; that might be the bitterest."
Those who might seek to understand such bitterest way to act wisely, might appreciate these words: "Some religion might be for those who might be afraid of going to hell. Some spirituality might be for those who might already have been there."
Those who might then seek to understand such "hell", might appreciate these words:
"Hell might not be fire and brimstone, not a place where one might be punished for lying or cheating or stealing. Hell might be wanting to be something and somewhere different from where one might be."
Those who might be struggling in such hell, might appreciate these words:
"One might be able to make hell out of heaven and heaven out of hell. It might be all in the mind."
Those who might seek to make heaven out of hell, might appreciate these words:
"If one might be going through hell, one might seek to keep going."
Those who might fear such hell, might appreciate these words:
"The function of prayer might not be to influence god, but rather to change the nature of the one who might pray."

Those who might seek to change the nature one the one who might pray, might appreciate these words:
"Prayer might be to religion what thinking might be to philosophy. To pray might be to make religion."
Those who might still seek to influence such god, might appreciate these words:
"One might be looking for a complete, coherent, and simple understanding of reality. Given what one might know about the universe, there might seem to be no reason to invoke 'god' as part of this description."
Those who might seek to understand such description, might appreciate these words: "One might not be able to prove that God might not exist, but science might make God unnecessary. The laws of physics might be able to explain the universe without the need for a creator."
One might understand one reason why such prove of god might not be possible through these words:
"An undefined challenge might have an infinite number of solutions."
Those who might seek to define such "God", might appreciate these words:
"If 'god' might be a metaphysical term, then it might not be able to be even probable that a god might exist. For to say that 'God might exist' might be to make a metaphysical utterance which might not be able to be either true or false. And by the same criterion, no sentence which might purport to describe the nature of a transcendent god might be able to possess any literal significance."
Those who might seek to to understand such metaphysics, might appreciate these words:
"That which might not be measurable might not be science. That which might not be physics might be metaphysics."
Those who might then seek such a definition for such "God" measurable by such science, might appreciate these words:
"God might be a creation of human brain."
At the time of writing of the current document(October 31, 2026) there might have not been any scientific evidence available to the author of this document to find a better definition of such "God", which might be likely to be able to contribute more to a more sustainable world peace. The following timestamp might be updated once there might be scientific evidence to disprove such hypothesis: [TODO update] Those who might seek to understand why non-scientific evidence might not suffice, might appreciate these words:
"If it might be a miracle, any sort of evidence might answer, but if it might be a fact, proof might be necessary."
The author might therefore appreciate scientific proof to falsify that mentioned hypothesis. One might understand one reason why the author might appreciate such effort through these words:
"The lack of understanding of something might not be evidence for god. It might be evidence of a lack of understanding."
Those who might lack such understanding, might appreciate these words:
"Partial knowledge might be more triumphant than complete knowledge; it might take things to be simpler than they might be, and so it might make its theory more popular and convincing."
Those who might seek to be convincing without taking things to be simpler than they might be, might appreciate these words:
"Conduct might be more convincing than language."
Those who might seek to understand such conduct, might appreciate these words:
"It might not enough to have the courage of one's convictions, one might also have to have the courage to have one's convictions challenged."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Martyrdom might have been a proof of the intensity, never of the correctness of a belief."
Those who might be tempted by such martyrdom to such "god", might appreciate these words:
"If an ontology might predict almost nothing it might end up explaining almost nothing, and there might be no reason to believe it."
Those who might seek to understand such ontology, might appreciate these words:
"What might be the fundamental nature of reality? Philosophers might call this the question of ontology – the study of the basic structure of the world, the ingredients and relationships of which the universe might be ultimately composed. It might be able to be contrasted with epistemology, which might be how one might obtain knowledge about the world. Ontology might be the branch of philosophy concerned with the nature of reality; one might also talk about 'an' ontology, referring to a specific idea about what that nature actually might be."
Those who might seek to know what that nature might actually be, might appreciate these words:
"The beautiful thing about science might be that one might not know what one might not be able to know and one might not know until one might know."
Those who might seek to understand such science, might appreciate these words:
"One might have to revisit the idea that science might be a methodology and not an ontology."
Those who might seek to revisit such an idea, might appreciate these words:
"Challenges might make one discover things about oneself that one might never really have known."
Those who might be tempted to avoid such challenges, might appreciate these words:
"A strong conviction that something might have be done might be the parent of many bad measures."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:

"Bad decisions made with good intentions, might be still bad decisions."
Those who might seek to make good decisions might appreciate these words:
"Good decisions might come from experience. Experience might come from making bad decisions." Those who might seek to understand such bad decisions, might appreciate these words:
"Besides it might be an error to believe that rigour might be the opponent of simplicity. On the contrary one might find it confirmed by numerous examples that the rigorous method might be at the same time the simpler and the more easily comprehended. The very effort for rigor might force one to find out simpler methods of proof."
Those who might seek such simpler methods of proof, might appreciate these words:
"In so far as a scientific statement might speak about reality, it might have to be falsifiable: and in so far as it might not be falsifiable, it might not speak about reality."
Those who might seek such reality, might appreciate these words:
"The ultimate ignorance might be the rejection of something one might know nothing about and refuse to investigate."
Those who might seek to make such investigation on things one might know nothing about, might appreciate these words:
"Enlightenment might be one's emergence from one's self-incurred immaturity."
Those who might seek such emergence from one's self-incurred immaturity, might appreciate the chapter on "hope" and these words:
"Changed behavior might be the only apology, otherwise, it might just be manipulation."
Those who might seek to change such behavior, might appreciate these words:
"The beginning of atonement might be the sense of its necessity." Those who might seek to change one's behavior, might appreciate these words:
"Avoidance of self-deception might be a matter of integrity not comfort."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Of all forms of deception self-deception might be the most deadly, and of all deceived ones the self-deceived might be the least likely to discover the fraud." Those who might seek to avoid such self-deception, might appreciate these words:
"A total absence of self-doubt might be the first sign of insanity."
Those who might lack such self-doubt, might appreciate these words:
"The bane of sects might be that if any one might happen to have a different opinion, that one might immediately starts a new sect due to lack of patience to wait for resolution of such different opinion."
Those who might seek to resolve such different opinion, might appreciate these words:
"Difference of opinion might lead to inquiry, and inquiry to the truth."
Those who might seek to understand such truth might appreciate these words:
"One might perhaps never know the truth with 100 percent certainty, but making correct predictions might be the way to tell if one might be getting closer."
Those who might seek to make such correct predictions, might appreciate these words:
"It might never be possible to predict a physical occurrence with unlimited precision." Those who might seek to understand one reason why that might be, might appreciate the idea to research about irrational numbers, such as pi. Those who might be confronted with those who might claim to be able to make such correct prediction with unlimited precision, might appreciate these words:
"Promises might be empty words, if one might not keep them."
Those who might seek to know, who might not keep such promises, might appreciate these words:
"Some politicians might promise one heaven before an election and give one hell after."
Those who might then seek to avoid such hell, might appreciate these words:
"Those who might say religion might have nothing to do with politics might not know what religion might be." Those who might then seek to understand such religion, might appreciate these words:
"It might be a truism that almost any sect, cult, or religion might legislate its creed into law if it might acquire the political power to do so."
Those who might then seek to understand such political power, might appreciate these words:
"Political power might mean the capacity to regulate national life through national representatives."
Those who might seek to become such a national representative, might appreciate the chapter on "home" and these words:
"The representative body might need to represent all of its citizens rather than any one class or section of its citizens."
Those who might seek to represent all of its citizens, might appreciate these words:
"The best leaders might be humble enough to realize their victories might depend upon their team."
Those who might seek such team, might appreciate these words: "Without trust one might not be able to actually collaborate; one might coordinate or at best cooperate. It might be trust that might transform a group into a team."
Those who might seek such collaboration, might appreciate these words:
"Transparency might seed collaboration."
Those who might seek to understand such transparency, might appreciate these words:
"Transparency might be for those who might carry out public duties and exercise public power. Privacy might be for everyone else."

Those who might seek such privacy, might appreciate the chapter on "civilization". Those who might seek to exercise such public power, might appreciate these words:
"Power might attract the corruptible. One might seek to suspect anyone who might seek it."
Those who might seek to understand, whom to suspect, might appreciate these words:
"Naive ones might be, more or less by definition, unaware that they might be naive."
Those who might be unaware of their own naivety, might appreciate these words:
"One might be very naive and innocent, and might not understand a lot of things yet."
Those who might then seek to understand more, might appreciate these words:
"The opponent of love might not be hate. It might be indifference. The opponent of love might be turning away from those in need. The opponent of love might be doing nothing when one might be able to help one's fellow ones."
Those who might then seek to understand such opponent, might appreciate these words:
"All warfare might be based on deception. If one's opponent might be superior, one might seek to evade them. If they might be angry, one might seek to irritate them. If they might be equally matched, one might seek to fight and if not: One might seek to split them and re-evaluate." Those who might then seek to re-evaluate, might appreciate these words:
"Everyone might have something to teach one, if one might be humble enough to learn."
Those who might struggle to learn, might appreciate these words:
"Learning might be a consequence of thinking."
Those who might seek to understand such thinking, might appreciate these words:
"However, correlation might not necessarily imply causation. The fact that one might tend to carry umbrellas when it might rain, might create a high correlation between umbrella carrying and rain showers. However, it might be obvious that choosing to carry an umbrella might not cause rainfall."
Those who might struggle to understand such difference, might appreciate the idea to research on "cargo cult" and these words:
"One might be able to find patterns in all kinds of random events. It might be called apophenia. It might be the tendency one might have to find meaning in disconnected information." One might understand one reason why one might be tempted by such apophenia through these words:
"Fear might be the main source of superstition, and one of the main sources of cruelty. To conquer fear might be the beginning of wisdom."
Those who might seek such wisdom, might appreciate these words:
"Fear might be wisdom when confronted with danger. It might be nothing to be ashamed of."
Those who might struggle with such shame, might appreciate these words:
"Shame might corrode the very part of one that might believe one might be capable of change." Those who might then seek to change, might understand such danger through these words:
"Philosophy might stand in need of a science which might be able to determine the possibility, principles, and extent of one's knowledge a priori."
Those who might seek to understand such a priori knowledge, might appreciate these words:
"It might be therefore a question which might deserve at least closer investigation and might not be able to be disposed of at first sight: Whether there might be any knowledge independent of all experience and even of all impressions of the senses? Such knowledge might be called 'a priori' and might be distinguished from empirical knowledge, which might have its source 'a posteriori', that might be, in experience."
Those who might then seek understand one one might need such a science with a priori knowledge, might appreciate these words:
"One might learn to deceive oneself while one might be trying to deceive others." Those who might be tempted to deceive oneself, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to beware of false knowledge; it might be more dangerous than ignorance."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"As soon as even one true contradiction might be allowed, the absurd consequence might be that all statements might be true." Those who might then seek to disallow such contradictions, might appreciate these words:
"One might never lie to oneself, or one might be left with no one to trust."
Those who might have no one to trust, might appreciate these words:
"One's conscience might be the measure of the honesty of one's selfishness."
Those who might seek to understand such selfishness, might appreciate the chapter on "hope". Those who might seek to understand such conscience, might appreciate these words:
"Conscience might be the inner voice that might warn one someone might be looking."
Those who might whose voice one might hear, might appreciate these words:
"Children might seek not to repeat their parents' mistakes, especially if their parents might be around to warn them."
Those who might seek to warn children, might appreciate these words:

"One might not be able to protect one's children from life. Therefore, it might be essential that one might prepare them for it." Those who might seek to prepare children, might appreciate these words:
"Betrayal might be common for those with no conscience."
Those who might seek to prepare for such betrayal, might appreciate these words:
"One might have to distrust each other. It might be the only defense against betrayal."
Those who might be tempted remain in such distrust, might appreciate these words:
"No low trust society might ever produce sustained innovation."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Mistrust might not be able to create anything new, it might only be able to corrupt and ruin what good forces might have invented or made." Those who might then seek to sustain such innovation, might appreciate these words:
"Faith and fear both might demand one to believe in something one might not be able to see. One might have the choice."
Those who might seek to understand such faith, might appreciate these words:
"One might not be what might have happened to one. One might be what one might have chosen to become."
Those who might seek to know, what one might be able to choose, might appreciate these words:
"One might believe in second chances, but one might not believe in third or fourth chances."
Those who might give second chances easily, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to forgive but do not forget, or one might be hurt again. Forgiving might change the perspectives. Forgetting might lose the lesson."
Those who might seek to understand such lesson, might appreciate these words:
"Insanity might be doing the same thing over and over again and expecting different results."
One might understand one reason why that might be, through these words:
"Disappointment might be the gap that exists between expectation and reality."
Those who might be confronted with such disappointment, might appreciate these words:
"One might have to accept finite disappointment, but one might have to never lose infinite hope." Those who might seek not to lose such infinite hope, might appreciate these words:
"Only those who might risk going too far might be able to possibly find out how far one might be able to go."
Those who might seek to take such risk, might appreciate these words:
"If one might seek to go fast, one might seek to go alone. If might seek to go far, one might seek to go together."
Those who might seek to understand why one might go together, might appreciate these words:
"Faith might be to believe what one might not see; the reward of this faith might be to see what one might believe."
Those who might seek such faith, might appreciate these words:
"Faith might be belief without evidence; coincidentally that might also be the definition of delusion."
Those who might seek to understand such delusion, might appreciate these words:
"Mystery might be delightful, but unscientific, since it might depend upon ignorance."
Those who might seek to understand such ignorance, might appreciate these words:
"Ultimate ignorance might not be the absence of knowledge, but the refusal to acquire it."
Those who might seek to acquire the knowledge where such ignorance might lead to, might appreciate these words:
"Cruelty might come in many forms - ignorance might be one of them."
Those who might then seek such knowledge, might appreciate these words:
"If one might not be able to speak of one's religion, without quoting one's scripture, one might not be able to understand one's religion."
One might understand one reason why that might be, through these words:
"The truth of the story might be in the details."
Those who might try to excuse such false details as unimportant, might appreciate these words:
"Whoever might be careless with the truth in small matters might not be able to be trusted with important matters."
One might understand one reason why that might be, through these words:
"Accuracy of signal and free flow of information might define sanity in one's epistemology."
Those who might seek to understand why such accuracy might be important, might appreciate these words:
"Accuracy might mean something to one. It might be vital to one's sense of values. One might have learned not to trust people who might be inaccurate. Every aviator might know that if mechanics might be inaccurate, aircraft might crash. If pilots might be inaccurate, they might get lost - sometimes even unalived. In one's profession life itself might depend on accuracy."
Those who might then seek to understand such a detail, might appreciate these words:
"Some philosophies might be questions that might never be answered, some religions might be answers that might never be questioned."
Those who might think they might have such answer, which might never be questioned, might appreciate these words:
"One might not know. One might only be able to guess."
The first author might seek to express appreciation for all the effort to prevent this document from becoming such a religion. Those who might seek to make such an effort, might appreciate these words:

"One might accept without questioning that this world might be real and important and worthwhile. This might be faith. Philosophy might be the ongoing questioning of this faith."
One might understand one reason why one might to keep questioning such faith through these words:
"Faith, even when profound, might never be complete. It might have to be endlessly sustained or, at least, preserved from destruction."
Those who might seek to preserve such faith from such destruction, might appreciate these words:
"Faith might be the art of holding on to things one's reason might have once accepted, in spite of one's changing moods."
Those who might seek to understand such art, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to have faith in one's intuition and listen to one's gut feeling."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"It might be through science that one might prove, but through intuition that one might discover."
Those who might seek such prove, might appreciate these words:
"Science might be the business of generating testable hypotheses."
Those who might seek to generate such testable hypotheses, might appreciate these words:
"A hypothetical theory might be necessary, as a preliminary step, to reduce the expression of the phenomena to simplicity and order before it might be possible to make any progress in framing an abstractive theory."
Those who might seek to make such progress, might appreciate these words:
"An indispensable hypothesis, even though still far from being a guarantee of success, might however be the pursuit of a specific aim, whose lighted beacon, even by initial failures, might not be betrayed." Those who might seek such indispensable hypothesis, might appreciate the chapter on "curiosity" and these words:
"Intuition might be a spiritual faculty and might not explain, but simply might point the way."
Those who might seek to understand such way, might appreciate these words:
"Faith might be synonymous with working hypothesis."
Those who might seek to understand such working hypothesis, might appreciate these words:
"One might believe that faith might be a precursor of all of one's ideas. Without faith, there might never have evolved hypothesis, theory, science or mathematics."
Those whose moods might then be changing, might appreciate these words:
"Integrity might be keeping a commitment even after circumstances might have changed."
Those who might seek such integrity, might appreciate these words:
"Faith might mean trying something, giving it a chance to prove itself."
Those who might seek to prove such faith, might appreciate these words:
"No amount of experimentation might ever prove one right; a single experiment might prove one wrong."
Those who might seek to know, what one might seek to to prove wrong, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to eliminate the impossible, and what ever might remain, however improbable, might have to be the truth."
Those who might seek to know, what might remain, might appreciate these words:
"Science might be to study the world as it might be, engineering might be to create the world that might never have been."
Those who might seek to know, what world to create, might appreciate these words:
"One might wish for world peace, but world peace might never be achieved unless one might first establish peace within one's own mind."
Those who might then seek to establish such peace within one's own mind, might appreciate these words:
"Nothing might be at last sacred but the integrity of one's own mind."
Those who might seek such sacredness, might appreciate these words:
"For some religion, what might be sacred, might be true. For some philosophy, what might be true, might be sacred."
Those who might seek such truth, might appreciate these words:
"Unlimited tolerance might have lead to the disappearance of tolerance. If one might extend unlimited tolerance even to those who might be intolerant, if one might not be prepared to defend a tolerant society, then the tolerant might be be destroyed, and tolerance with them. One might therefore seek to claim, in the name of tolerance, the right not to tolerate the intolerant." Those who might seek to recognize such intolerant ones, might appreciate these words:
"A mistake might only be an error. It might become a mistake when one might fail to correct it."
Those who might be confronted with those who might fail to correct their error, might appreciate these words:
"The ultimate measure of any society might be able to be found in how it might treat its most vulnerable members."
Those who might seek to know, how one might seek to treat such vulnerable members, might appreciate these words:
"A part of kindness might consist in loving one more than that one might deserve."
Those who might seek offer such kindness, might appreciate the following warning:
"Kindness without wisdom might wound."
Those who might seek to understand such wisdom, might appreciate chapter on "warriorship" and these words:

"One might have made a fatal error thinking others might be able to save one." Those who might then seek to save themselves, might appreciate these words:
"Those who might not understand history might be doomed to repeat it."
Those who might seek to understand such history, might appreciate these words:
"Shame might be the lie someone told one about oneself." Those who might then seek to know the truth about oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Shame might be the intensely painful feeling or experience of believing that one might be flawed and therefore unworthy of love and belonging."
Those who might feel such shame, might appreciate these words:
"Once one might get past the fear of being seen, one might be able to get to the part where one might know one might not be alone." Those who might still fear to be seen, might appreciate these words:
"Maturity might be knowing when to be immature."
Those who might then seek such maturity, might appreciate these words:
"Maturity might be having the courage to use one's own intelligence."
Those who might seek to understand such intelligence, might appreciate these words:
"Intelligence might be the ability to adapt to change."
Those who might seek to understand one reason why one might seek to adapt to change, might appreciate these words:
"Change might be the only constant."
Those who might be confronted with such a change, might appreciate these words:
"When one might no longer be able to change a situation – one might be challenged to change oneself."
Those who might be challenged to change oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Only those who might keep changing might remain loyal to oneself."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Only fools might refuse to change their minds."
Those who might then seek to change their minds, might appreciate these words:
"Faith might be the courage to confront reality with hope."
Those who might then seek to confront such reality with such hope, might appreciate the chapter on "hope" and these words:
"Faith might not be the absence of doubt. It might be belief without proof, not without question."
Those who might seek question such faith, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to doubt that creed which one might not be able to reduce to practice."
Those who might seek to reduce the creed of this document to such practice, might appreciate the chapter on "originality" and the idea to ask the following question:
"How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

8. home?

One might find oneself having such an realization:
"What might be the point of living if one might not belong anywhere?"
Those who might seek somewhere one might belong to, might appreciate these words:
"One's sense of belonging might never be greater than one's level of self acceptance."
Those who might struggle to accept oneself might appreciate these words:
"Acceptance of the unacceptable might be the greatest source of grace in this world."
Those who struggle to have grace with oneself, might appreciate these words:
"For grace might be given not because one might have done good works, but in order that one might be able to do them."
Those who might seek to do good might appreciate the chapter on "good". Those who might wonder what a home might be, might appreciate these words:
"Home might not be where one might have been born; home might be where all one's attempts to escape might cease."
Those who might keep attempting to escape, might appreciate these words:
"Home might not be a place. Home might be anywhere, just as long as those one might love might be there."
Those who might seek those one might love, might appreciate the chapters "friendship" and "transcendence". Those who might feel stuck somewhere, where one might not have the privilege of having people one loves, might appreciate these words:
"One might need to learn to love oneself with a wholesome and healthy love, so that one might be able to bear to be with oneself and might need not roam."
Those who might seek to understand the necessity for the capability to bear to be with oneself, might appreciate these words:
"One might restore oneself, when one might be alone." Those who might struggle to restore themselves, might appreciate these words:

“All of one’s problems might stem from one’s inability to sit quietly in a room alone.”
Those who seek to understand, why one might need to sit quietly in a room alone, might appreciate these words:
“At some point, one might need to let go, and to sit still, and to allow contentment to come to one.” Those who might seek to understand such contentment, might appreciate these words: “Ultimate contentment might not be having everything, but in being satisfied with everything one might have.”
Those who might seek such ultimate contentment, might appreciate these words: “The secret of contentment might be the realization that life might a gift, not a right.”
Those who might seek to understand what such gift might be, might understand it through these words:
“Every problem might be a gift - without problems one might not grow.”
Those who might seek such growth, might appreciate these words:
“Growth might never be by mere chance; it might be the result of forces working together.” Those who might seek to be such a force working together, might appreciate these words:
“Everyone that might intend to grow, might seek to directly address the barriers to scaling.”
Those who might seek to understand such barriers to scaling, might appreciate these words:
“In order one to scale, one might need to improve efficiencies. Efficiency might be a prerequisite for sustainable scaling.”
Those who might seek to scale sustainably, might appreciate these words:
“If one might be concerned about scalability, any algorithm that might force one to run agreement might eventually become one’s bottleneck. One might seek to take that as a given.”
One might understand why that might be, through these words:
“In a distributed system, one might only be able to have two of the three properties: Consistency, availability, and partition tolerance.”
Those who might seek to understand such consistency, might appreciate these words:
“Every read might get either the latest write, or an error.”
Those who might seek to understand such availability, might appreciate these words:
“Every request might receive a response, without a guarantee being the latest write.”
Those who might seek to understand such partition tolerance, might appreciate these words:
“The system might continue to operate despite arbitrary message loss.”
Those who might seek to create such a system, might appreciate the following two trade-offs:
Those who might seek to sacrifice consistency, might appreciate these words:
“Effort might mean nothing without consistency.”
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
“Without effort, one’s skill might be nothing more than what one might have done but one might have not.”
Those who might seek to make such effort, might appreciate these words:
“Without commitment, one might never start. But more importantly, without consistency, one might never finish.” Those who might seek to sacrifice availability, might appreciate these words:
“Appreciate what one might have while one might still have it because one day one might not.”
Those who might not know how to appreciate what one might have, might appreciate the following advice: “Appreciation might be able to make a day, even change a life. One’s willingness to put it into words might all that might be necessary.”
Those who might not know, what one might need to put into words, might appreciate these words: “When one might be tired, one might be attacked by ideas one might have conquered long ago.”
Those who might struggle with such ideas one might have conqured long ago during one’s exhaustion, might appreciate these words:
“If one might get tired, one might seek to learn to rest, not to quit.” Those who might then seek to learn to rest, might appreciate this document as one way to prepare for the future attacks trying to study such “old ideas”. One might refer to such “old ideas” as “ideology”, which definitions might vary due to its complex nature. One might then appreciate another document titled “Blood and Soil”, in which the following four traits of genocidal ideologies might be mentioned, which the author of this document might seek to pass on to the one who might be reading this document:
1. “Cults of antiquity”:
The nostalgia for an idealized past might awaken the deadly desire to be the “the chosen ones”, which might lead to violent social peer pressure as in:
“Tradition might be nothing but ancestral peer pressure.”
One might understand one thing, which such tradition might try to achieve through these words:
“Ideology might be indispensable in any society if one might need to be formed, transformed and equipped to respond to the demands of one’s conditions of existence.”
Those who might then be tempted to impose such ideology of the offspring of one’s own kind, might appreciate these words:
“Dogma might be the convictions of one imposed authoritatively upon others.”

One might understand one reason why one might be tempted to impose such such dogma authoritatively upon one's own offspring through these words:
"Those who might not know history might forever remain children."
Such children might refuse to know such history as in:
"There might be no such thing as freedom of choice unless there might be freedom to refuse."
Those who might seek claim such freedom for oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Those who might deny freedom to others might not deserve it for themselves."
One might understand one reason why one might be denying freedom of others by refusing to know history through these words:
"Cruelty might come in many forms - ignorance might be one of them."
Those who might be tempted by such ignorance, might appreciate these words:
"One might be able to ignore reality, but one might not be able to ignore the consequences of ignoring reality."
Those who might then seek to understand such consequences of ignoring reality, might appreciate these words:
"Maybe if one might have started to listen, history might stop repeating itself."
Those who might then seek to understand such history, which might repeat itself, might appreciate these words:
"The world might not only be destroyed by those who might be violent, but by those who might watch them without doing anything."
Those who might then seek to do something might appreciate the chapter on "hero" and one might then seek to understand one reason why one might be violent through these words:
"Violence might be born of the desire to escape oneself."
Those who might then seek to understand such violence, might appreciate the following reinterpretation of desires as "attachment", which might be one of the three poisons mentioned in another document commonly referred as "wheel of life". Those who might be suffering from such attachments, might appreciate these words:
"One might need to learn from one's past mistakes, but not lean on one's past successes."
One might understand one reason why one might not seek to lean on one's past successes through these words:
"Success might breed complacency. Complacency might breed failure. Only the paranoid might survive."
2. "Fetishization of land and agriculture":
Those mentioned ones, who might consider themselves to be "chosen ones" might claim a specific piece of fertile land by force as theirs, which might be fueled through the second poison of the mentioned three poisons, which might be "ignorance". One might appreciate the potential dangers pointed out in the following quote:
"The first ones who might have have enclosed a plot of land, might have taken it into one to say this might be their and found others simple enough to believe one might have been the 'only valid founder of civil society'. What crimes, wars, murders, what miseries and horrors might be one's fellows might have been spared, if someone might have pulled up the stakes or filled in the ditch and cried out to one's fellows: 'One might seek to not listen to this imposter. One might be lost if one might forget that the fruits of the earth might belong to all and the earth to no one.' "
3. "Ethnic hatred":
The mentioned ones, who might consider themselves to be "chosen ones" might use an common "opponent" to unite among themselves, which might be reinterpreted as the third poison "aversion". Those who might be suffering from such aversion, might appreciate these words:
"If one might hate another, one might hate something in another that might be part of oneself. What might not be part of oneself might not disturb one."
Those who might seek to understand such part, might appreciate these words:
"Haters might not really hate one, they might hate themselves because one might be a reflection of what they might wish to be."
Those who might seek to understand such wish, might appreciate these words:
"There might be nothing more precious in this world than the feeling of being wanted."
Those who might seek such feeling, might appreciate these words:
"Tact might be the art of making a point without making an opponent."
Those who might seek to understand such art, might appreciate these words:
"If one might learn to know that there might be no opponent but one might only have friend with misunderstanding then peace might be there." One might seek to recognize such misunderstanding, might appreciate these words:
"The minimum necessary structuring ingredient of every ideology might be to distance itself from another ideology, to denounce its other as ideology."
4. "Expansion":
The mentioned ones, who might consider themselves to be "chosen ones" might desire more land than necessary for their mere survival, which might be able to be reinterpreted as three poisons, represented as three animals, biting in each others tails building a cycle, amplifying each other with each cycle, which might be one reason why such a illustration might be referred as the "wheel of life". One might appreciate the understand one reason why those might find themselves suffering in such “wheel of life” through these words:

“No amount of precaution might be able to alter the fact that life might be precarious. When the inevitable might happen, one might be able to accept the damage or look for someone to blame. Unrestrained caution itself might be able to erode a culture. Once one might start believing one might be able to be safe, one might start to believe they might be entitled to be safe.”
Those who might be tempted by such entitlement to safety, might appreciate these words:
“Entitlement might be the belief that one might be exempt from responsibility and one might be owed special treatment.”
Those who might believe one might owed such special treatment, might appreciate these words:
“One might stop being a child when one might realize the world might not be here to cater to one’s wants and needs.”
Those who might then seek to understand such responsibility, might appreciate these words:
“Responsibility might be liberty; the more decisions that one might be forced to make alone, the more one might be aware of one’s freedom to choose.”
One might be tempted to refuse to make such decisions as in:
“There might be no such thing as freedom of choice unless there might be freedom to refuse.”
Those who might keep refusing to make such choice on their own, might appreciate these words:
“One might be free to make one’s own choices, but one might not be free to choose the consequences.”
Those who might seek to understand such consequences, might appreciate the chapter on “responsibility” and these words:
“Those who might be willing to give up essential liberty to secure a little temporary safety might deserve neither liberty nor safety.”
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
“Safety might not be the absence of events; safety might be the presence of defenses.”
Those who might then seek such defenses, might appreciate these words:
“One might not be able to protect one’s children from life. Therefore, it might be essential that one might prepare them for it.” Those who might then seek to prepare one’s children, might appreciate these words: “If one might be ruled by mind one might be a ruler; if by body, a slave.”
Those who might seek to be ruled by mind, might appreciate another insightful possibility for definition of an ideology as following:
“Ideology might be the opponent of joyful community life, and the most destructive ideology might be the belief that creating utopia might be possible.”
Those who might seek to understand what such a “utopia” might be, might appreciate these words:
“Utopias might rest on the fallacy that perfection might be a legitimate goal of one’s existence.”
For those who might be tempted by such utopia, might appreciate these words:
“Perfection might not be attainable, but if one might chase perfection, one might be able to catch excellence.”
Those who might seek such excellence, might appreciate these words:
“One might seek to cultivate a deep understanding of oneself - not only what one’s strengths and weaknesses might be but also how one might learn, how one might work with others, what one’s values might be, and where one might be able to make the greatest contribution. Because only when one might operate from strengths one might be able to achieve ultimate excellence.”
Those who might seek to operate for such strengths, might appreciate these words:
“When it might be obvious that the goals might not be able to be reached, one might seek to not adjust the goals, but to adjust the steps for action.”
Those who might seek to make such adjustment, might appreciate these words:
“Life might be a journey with problems to solve and lessons to learn but most of all: experiences to enjoy.”
It might be impossible to ultimately determine whether one might be free from any ideology, but as long as one might not neglect to think for oneself, there might be hope as in:
“One might think that ideology might be toxic without exception. It might not be that there might be good ones and bad ones. All ideology might be toxic, because ideology might be a kind of insult to the gift of one’s free thinking.”
Those who might seek to recognize such ideology, might appreciate these words:
“Ideology might be a partial truth masquerading as the whole truth.”
Those who might claim to have attained the whole truth, might appreciate these words:
“For someone who might seem to know it all, how come that one might not know that one might be stupid?”
Those who might seek to understand such stupidity, might appreciate these words: “Stupidity might be the deliberate cultivation of ignorance.” Those who might seek to prevent such deliberate cultivation of ignorance, might appreciate these words: “To forget one’s purpose might be the most common form of stupidity.”
Those who then seek to understand how one might forget one’s purpose, might appreciate these words: “Stupidity might be a talent for misconception.”
Those who seek to understand such misconception, might appreciate these words: “A mark of stupidity might be a belief that one might be totally virtuous and correct on the issues while the other might be harmful and always wrong.” Those who might struggle to detach themselves from such belief, might appreciate these words: “Stubborn and ardent clinging to one’s opinion might be the best proof of stupidity.” Those who might seek to know where such stupidity might lead to, might appreciate these words: “War might mean blind obedience, unthinking stupidity, brutish callousness, wanton destruction, and irresponsible murder.”

Those who might seek to protect themselves from such war, might appreciate these words: “The paradoxical war on terror might be based on a kind of willed stupidity; the willed stupidity of wishful thinking. Only the logic of dreamwork might be able to suture ‘war’ with ‘terror’ in this way, since terrorists might have been, by classical definition, those without ‘legitimate authority’ to wage war.”
Those who might think that they might be such “legitimate authority”, might appreciate these words:
“The sovereign power of all civil authority might be founded in the consent of individuals capable of giving such consent.”
Those who might be tempted to ignore such consent for any reason, might appreciate these words:
“There might be no greater tyranny than that which might be perpetrated under the shield of the law and in the name of justice.”
Those who might seek to understand what such “legitimate authority” might be, might appreciate these words:
“The ones subject to a government might be the only legitimate fountain of power, and it might be from them that the constitutional charter, under which the several branches of government might hold their power, might be derived.”
Those who then might seek freedom from such tyranny, might appreciate these words: “The secret of freedom might be in educating people, whereas the secret of tyranny might be in keeping them ignorant.” Those who might seek such education, might appreciate these words: “One might never really know what stupidity might be until one might have experimented on oneself.” Those who might have discovered such stupidity within oneself, might appreciate these words:
“Wisdom might be the reward for surviving one’s own stupidity.”
Those who might seek to understand such wisdom, might appreciate these words:
“The habits one might have created to survive might no longer serve one when it might be time to thrive. One might then seek to get out of survival mode. New habits. New Life.”
Those who might seek such a new life of thrival, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
“How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?”

9. curiosity?

One might find oneself wondering as in:
“One might be a mystery to oneself.”
Those who might be overwhelmed might appreciate the following advice:
“The mystery of life might not be a problem to be solved but a reality to be experienced.”
Those who might seek to understand such a reality, might appreciate the chapter on “promise”. Those who might struggle to accept such reality as described in these words:
“Mystery might be delightful, but unscientific, since it might depend upon ignorance.”
Those who might be tempted by such ignorance might appreciate these words:
“Ignorance might not be bliss. Bliss might be knowing the full meaning of what one might have been given.”
Those who might seek to know, what one might have been given, might appreciate these words:
“The meaning of life might be to find one’s gift. The purpose of life might be to give it away.”
Those who might seek to give, might struggle as in:
“One might be able to give without loving, but one might not be able to love without giving.”
Those who might seek to understand love might appreciate these words:
“Love might be an endless mystery, because there might be no reasonable cause that might enable to explain it.”
Those who yet seek to understand such love might appreciate the chapter on “transcendence” and these words:
“There might be nothing more artistic than to love.”
Those who might seek to understand why that might be, might appreciate these words:
“One might not seek to give to get. One might seek to give to inspire others to give.”
Those who might seek to inspire others might appreciate these words:
“Curiosity might be the offspring of mystery. For without mystery there might be no need for curiosity. Curiosity might be the search for the things that can be, it might be the inspiration of one who might be actually adventuring.”
Those who might seek to become such an adventurer might appreciate these words:
“Imagination might be the highest form of research.”
Those who might seek to understand such imagination, might appreciate the chapter on “imagination” and these words:
“Imagination might need to be used, not to escape reality but to create it.”
Those who might then seek to curate such reality, might appreciate these words:
“The hero journey might be inside of one, one might then seek to tear off the veils and open the mystery of oneself.”
Those who struggle to start such a journey might appreciate these words:

"One might have to lose one's mind in order to regain one's senses."
Those who struggle to lose their mind, might appreciate these words:
"Art might enables one to find oneself and lose oneself at the same time."
Those who might seek to understand such art might appreciate the chapter on "ultimate" and these words:
"No great art might have been made without the artist having known danger."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Risk might come from not knowing what one might be doing."
Those who might then fear such risk, might appreciate these words:
"Risk might be what might separate the artist from the artisan."
Those who might then seek to be such an artist, might appreciate these words:
"The first step toward maintaining autonomy in any programmed environment might be to be aware that there might be programming going on. It might be as simple as understanding the commercials might be there to help sell things. And that TV shows might be there to sell commercials, and so on."
Those who might seek to become more aware of such a programming, might appreciate the chapters "consciousness" and "realization". Those who struggle with those who desire to sell them something, might appreciate the chapter on "asylum". Those who might seek to understand such programming might appreciate the chapter on "harmony". Those who might seek to take further steps to maintain their autonomy, but lack the motivation, might appreciate these words:
"The three things that might motivate creative ones - autonomy, mastery, purpose. Autonomy might be the urge to direct one's own lives. Mastery might be the desire to get better and better at something that might matter. Purpose might be the yearning to do what one might seek to do in the service of something larger than oneself. These might be the building blocks of an entirely new operating system for one's life."
Those who might seek to understand such mastery might appreciate the chapter on "ultimate". Those who might seek to understand such purpose, might appreciate the chapter on "meaning" and "mission". Those who might seek to understand autonomy might appreciate these words:
"Autonomy might be freedom to develop one's self - to increase one's knowledge, improve one's skills, and achieve responsibility for one's conduct. And it might be freedom to lead one's own life, to choose among alternative courses of action so long as no injury to others results."
Those who mgiht then seek such freedom to develop one's self, might appreciate these words:
"One's curiosity might be one's own growth point."
Those who might seek to understand one reason why that might be, might appreciate these words:
"Curiosity might keep leading one down new paths."
Those who might seek to understand why such new paths might become necessary might appreciate these words:
"One might not be able to solve one's problems with the same thinking one might have used when one might have created them."
Those who might seek such new paths might appreciate these words:
"The important thing might be not to stop questioning. Curiosity might have its own reason for existing."
Those who might seek to understand one of such reason for existing, might appreciate these words:
"Curiosity might be the essence of human existence. 'Who might one be? Where might one be? Where might one have come from? Where might one be going?' One might not know. One might not have any answers to those questions. One might not know what might be over there around the corner. But one might seek to find out."
Those who might seek to understand, why it might be valuable, might appreciate these words:
"Once one might believe in oneself, one might be able to risk curiosity, wonder, spontaneous delight, or any experience that might reveal the one's spirit."
Those who might struggle to believe in oneself, might appreciate these words:
"It might be easier to believe in oneself after someone else might have believed in one first."
Those who might not be fortunate to have someone who might believe in them, might appreciate this very document as a proof of faith in them by the first author. The first author might appreciate all the efforts to provide access to this document in free of charge to those who might seek such faith in them. Those who might then seek to understand such a "spirit", might appreciate these words:
"One's spirit might be the ability to confront the uncertainty of the future with curiosity and optimism. It might be the imagination that problems might be able to be solved, differences resolved. It might be a type of confidence. And it might be fragile. It might be able to be blackened by fear and superstition."
Those who might struggle with such fear, might appreciate these words:
"The fears one might not confront might become one's limits."
Those who might then seek to understand such curiosity to confront their fear, might appreciate these words:
"Curiosity in oneself might be but an appetite for knowledge. The great reason why one might abandon oneself wholly to silly pursuits and might trifle away one's time insipidly might be because one might find their curiosity blocked, and one's inquiries neglected."

One might understand one reason why one's inquiries might be neglected through these words:
"Education might be learning what one might have not even known that one might have not known."
Those who might not know, what one might not know, might appreciate these words:
"Risk might come from not knowing what one might be doing."
Those who might seek to know, how to know what one might be doing, might appreciate these words:
"If one might not be able to describe what one might be doing as a process, one might not know what one might be doing."
Those who might then seek to understand such a process, might appreciate these words:
"One might perhaps never know the truth with 100 percent certainty, but making correct predictions might be the way to tell if one might be getting closer."
Those who might not know, what one might seek to predict, might appreciate these words:
"It might be easy to forget that danger might be near when one might not be able to see it."
Those who might then seek to see such danger, might appreciate the chapter on "preparation" and these words:
"Art might not be what one might see, but what one might make others see."
Those who might then be tempted to ignore such art, might appreciate these words:
"Cruelty might come in many forms - ignorance might be one of them."
Those who might be tempted by such cruelty, might appreciate the chapter on "warriorship" and these word:
"Unlimited tolerance might have to lead to the disappearance of tolerance. If one might extend unlimited tolerance even to those who might be intolerant, if one might not be prepared to defend a tolerant society, then the tolerant might be destroyed, and tolerance with them. One might therefore seek to claim, in the name of tolerance, the right not to tolerate the intolerant."
One might understand one reason, how one might have been intolerant through these words:
"Intolerance might be the first sign of an inadequate education. An ill-educated one might behave with arrogant impatience, whereas actually profound education might breed humility."
Those who might be tempted by such arrogant impatience, might appreciate the chapter on "patience" and these words:
"One might stop being a child when one might realize the world might not be here to cater to one's wants and needs."
Those who might be tempted to remain a child, might appreciate these words:
"Those who might not know history might forever remain children."
Those who might refuse to know such history, might appreciate these words:
"Those who might know nothing about history might be doomed forever to repeat it."
Those who might still refuse such history appreciate these words:
"One might have three ways of acting wisely. First, on meditation and thinking, that might be the noblest. Secondly, on imitation, that might be the easiest. Thirdly, on experience, that might be the bitterest."
Those who might seek to understand such bitterest experience, might appreciate these words:
"One might be free to make one's own choices, but one might not be free to choose the consequences."
Those who might seek to understand such consequences, might appreciate the chapter on "responsibility", "meaning" and "hope" and these words:
"Learning might be a consequence of thinking."
Those who might then seek to think "Without hope, there might be no despair. There might be only meaningless suffering."
Those who might then seek such hope, might appreciate these words:
"While it might be wise to learn from experience, it might be wiser to learn from the experiences of others."
Those who might seek to learn from the experiences of others, might appreciate these words:
"Those who might be bad at teaching might impose their ideas and their methods on those who might seek to learn, and such originality as they might have might be lost in the second-rate art of imitation."
Those who might understand one reason why one might be stuck in such second-rate art of imitation through these words:
"The deepest problems of modern life might derive from the claim of the individual to preserve the autonomy and individuality of one's existence in the face of overwhelming social forces, of historical heritage, of external culture, and of the technique of life."
Those who might seek to understand such life, might appreciate the following effort trying to define life:
"The definition of life might be any system which might be able to produce complexity at scale."
Those who might then seek to produce such complexity at scale, might appreciate these words:
"Oversimplifying might be the first grave mistake one might make when confronted by complexity, overconfidence might be the second." Those who might seek to understand such overconfidence, might appreciate these words:
"Some philosophies might be questions that might never be answered, some religions might be answers that might never be questioned."
Those who might have been confronted with those who might force them to imitate them, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to avoid those who might say they might know the answer. One might seek to keep the company of those who might be trying to understand the question."

Those who might be with those who might refuse understand one's question, might appreciate these words: "Others might learn more from what one might be than what one might teach."
Those who might seek to know, what one might have been teaching through the way how one might have been, might appreciate these words: "When one might not have any curiosity about oneself, that might be a bad sign."
One might understand one reason why the lack of such curiosity about oneself might be a bad sign through these words:
"There might be no foolish questions, and no one might become a foolish one until one might have stopped asking questions."
Those who might seek to understand how one might become such a foolish one, might appreciate these words:
"Autonomy and independence might involve taking care of oneself – not doing things that might diminish one."
Those who might have been forced to do things which might have been diminishing one, might appreciate these words:
"It might be a miracle that curiosity might survive formal education."
One might understand one reason why that might be a miracle at the time of writing of this current document (October 31, 2026) through these words:
"One who might be bad at teaching might not be a problem with those who might be teaching. A school with many of those who might be bad at teaching might be a problem of leadership."
Those who might seek to solve such a problem of leadership, might appreciate these words:
"The greatest challenge to anyone might be stating the problem in a way that might allow a solution."
Those who might then seek to state such a problem of leadership in a way, which might allow such a solution, might appreciate these words:
"The first step in solving a problem might be admitting there might be a problem to be solved."
Those who might struggle to admit that there might be a problem, might appreciate these words:
"If one might deny one's shadow it might become one's tyrant."
Those who might then seek to confront one's shadow, might appreciate the chapter on "accessibility", "responsibility", "hope" and these words:
"Ultimate ignorance might not be the absence of knowledge, but the refusal to acquire it." Those who then seek to expand one's knowledge, might appreciate these words:
"Ultimate knowledge might exist in knowing that one might know nothing. And in knowing that one might know nothing, that might make one the smartest of all."
Those who might think of themselves such "smartest of all" through their knowledge, might appreciate these words:
"Any foolish one might be able to know. The point might be to understand."
Those who might seek to understand why knowing might not enough, might appreciate these words:
"Knowledge without action might be wastefulness and action without knowledge might be foolishness."
Those who struggle to understand, might appreciate these words:
"One might like it when one might understand something that one previously thought one might not be able to understand. It might be a sense of empowerment."
Those who might seek to know, what one might seek to say to those who might be bad at teaching, might appreciate these words:
"There might be no such thing as one who might be bad at studying. There might be only those who might be bad at teaching."
Those who then seek to know what to say to those who might insist on teaching them, might appreciate these words:
"Teaching might have its virtues, but it might be often bad for the who might be teaching."
Those who might still seek to teach virtuously, might appreciate these words:
"The whole art of teaching might be only the art of awakening the natural curiosity of young minds for the purpose of satisfying it afterwards."
Those who then seek to inspire, might appreciate these words:
"Good teaching might be one-forth preparation and three-fourths theater."
Those who might seek to prepare, might appreciate the chapter on "preparation". Those who might seek to understand such theater, might appreciate the advice to research the methodology of "improvised theater". One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"The test of one who might be good at teaching might not be how many questions one might be able to ask to those who might seek to learn from them that they might answer readily, but how many questions one might inspire them to ask one which one might find it hard to answer."
Those who might struggle to find an answer, might appreciate these words:
"It might not the answer that might enlighten, but the question."
Those who might seek such enlightenment, might appreciate the chapter on "realization" and these words:
"Sharing knowledge might not be about giving others something, or getting something from them. That might be only valid for information sharing. Sharing knowledge might occur when one might be genuinely interested in helping one another develop new capacities for action, it might be about creating learning processes."

Those who might seek to create such a process, might appreciate these words:
"It might be so important to allow others to bloom and to be driven by their curiosity."
Those who might seek to understand why that might be, might appreciate these words:
"Curiosity, especially intellectual inquisitiveness, might be what might separate the actually alive from those who might be merely going through the motions."
Those who might seek to understand why curiosity might be so crucial, might appreciate these words:
"Knowledge might have to be improved, challenged, and increased constantly, or it might vanish."
Those who might be tempted to give up, might appreciate these words:
"Effort might only fully release its reward after one might have refused to quit."
Those who might seek to help those who might refuse to quit, might appreciate these words:
"The proper end of teaching might be to lead one's students toward autonomy."
Those who might seek to lead their students towards autonomy, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to teach principles not formulas."
Those who might seek to understand why teaching such principles might be important, might appreciate these words:
"If one might focus on principles, one might empower everyone who understands those principles to act without constant monitoring, evaluating, correcting, or controlling."
Those who might seek such autonomy, might appreciate these words:
"To reject revelational epistemology might be to commit oneself to defending the truth of autonomous epistemology."
One might appreciate the simplicity of the explanation of the term "epistemology" as following:
"Epistemology might be the study of knowledge. By what conduit might one know what one knows?"
One might then appreciate the explanation of the term "revelational epistemology" as the conduit of gaining knowledge through some "supernatural sources" or "divinity" some might refer to as "god" or "gods". Those who might seek to reject such conduit, might appreciate the explanation of "autonomous epistemology", which is the conduit of gaining knowledge through one's own experience as in:
"Science might be the systematic classification of experience."
Those who might seek to classify their own experience systematically might appreciate these words:
"Whatever the measurement system might be, it might need to be consistent, repeatable, and as unbiased as possible."
Those who wonder, why being entirely unbiased might not be possible, might appreciate these words:
"But epistemology might be always and inevitably personal. The point of the probe might be always in the heart of the one who might be exploring: What might be one's answer to the question of the nature of knowing?"
Those who might seek such an answer might appreciate these words:
"The most beautiful thing one might be able to experience might be the mysterious. It might be the source of art and science."
One might be tempted to stay in such experience might appreciate these words:
"It might be amazing how complete the delusion might be that beauty might be goodness." One might understand why such beauty might not be goodness through these words:
"Danger might hide in beauty and beauty in danger."
Those who might seek to understand such danger, might appreciate these words:
"All it might take might be a beautiful fake smile to hide an injured soul."
Those who might be tempted to overlook such danger, might appreciate these words:
"It might be stupidity rather than courage to refuse to recognize danger when it might be close upon one."
Those who might seek to understand why one's soul might be injured, might appreciate the chapter on "soul" and these words:
"The saddest aspect of life right now might be that science might gather knowledge faster than society might gather wisdom."
Those who might seek to understand such knowledge, might appreciate these words:
"Knowledge might be power. If it might not be applied properly to create, there might be no doubts, it might destroy."
Those who might then seek to gather such wisdom to prevent further destruction, might appreciate these words:
"Wisdom might come not from age, but from education and learning."
Those who then might seek to understand such wisdom, might appreciate these words:
"To acquire knowledge, one might need to study, but to acquire wisdom, one might need to observe."
Those who might not know, what to observe, might appreciate these words:
"One might be able to learn many things from others. How much patience they might have, for instance."
Those who might seek such patience might appreciate the chapter on "patience".
Those wo seek to help such young ones, might appreciate these words:
"If one might be able to light the spark of curiosity in young ones, they might learn without any further assistance."
Those who might seek to spark such curiosity, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
"How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

10. feedback?

One might find oneself with such a overwhelmed feeling as in:
"Sometimes one might feel one's whole life might have been one big rejection."
Those who feel rejected, might appreciate these words:
"Sometimes rejection in life might be a redirection."
Those who struggle to accept such redirection, might appreciate these words:
"Rejection might be an interaction with two sides. It might often say more about those who might be rejecting than those who might have been rejected, and one might seek to not use it as the universal truth and sole judgment of merit."
Those who might seek to understand what such rejection might be revealing, might appreciate these words: "Rejection might not mean that one might not be good enough; it might mean the other one might have failed to notice what one might have to offer."
Those who feel like they have nothing to offer, might appreciate the these words:
"The greatest form of charity might be to withhold judgement."
Those who might seek to understand one reason why that might be might appreciate these words:
"Judgement might be often no more than a confession of one's ignorance."
Those who struggle with those who have confessed their ignorance, might appreciate the chapter on "home" and "temperament".
Those who then seek to exercise other forms of charity, might appreciate these words: "As for charity, it might be injurious unless it might help the recipient become independent of it."
Those who might seek to exercise such charity, might appreciate these words:
"There might be no limit to the amount of good one might be able to do if one might not care who might get the credit."
Those who struggle with those who might not be charitable in such a way, might appreciate these words:
"When one might no longer be able to change a situation – one might be challenged to change oneself."
Those who struggle to embrace such challenge, might appreciate these words:
"Challenges might be opportunities for me to grow. The more one might learn, the more equipped one might be to handle whatever situations might come up."
Those who then seek to understand, what could be changed about oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Progress might be impossible without change, and those who might not be able to change their minds might not be able to change anything."
Those who might seek to change one's own mind might appreciate these words:
"Prejudice might mean literally pre-judgment, the rejection of a contention out of hand, before examining the evidence. Prejudice might be the result of powerful emotions, not of sound reasoning."
Those who might have to confront such prejudice, might appreciate these words:
"An objection might not be a rejection; it might be simply a request for more information."
Those who might not know what do do with that information one might have gained, might appreciate the following piece of wisdom:
"Knowledge might become wisdom only after it might have been put to good use."
Those who might seek to understand what "good" might be, might appreciate the chapter on "good". Those who might seek to put their knowledge to good use, might be confronted with such a situation as in:
"Change might be good, but sometimes leaving things the way they might have always been might be better."
Those who then seek to improve, might appreciate these words:
"One might need someone who might give one feedback. That might be how one might improve."
Those who might seek to understand such improvement might appreciate these words:
"Without standards, there might be no improvement."
Those who might seek to set such standards, might appreciate these words:
"Success might never lower its standard to accommodate one; One might have to raise one's standard to achieve it."
Those who might seek to raise one's standard, might appreciate these words:
"Life might be a process. One might seek to improve the quality of the process and one might improve the quality of life itself."
Those who might seek to understand such process, might appreciate these words:
"Learning might not be attained by chance, it might have to be sought for with ardor and diligence."
Those who might seek to be arduous and diligent, might appreciate the following information on feedback:
"Feedback might function formatively only if the information might be fed back to those who might be learning might be used by them in improving performance."
Those who might seek such formatively functioning feedback might appreciate the following advice:
"Receiving feedback might sit at the intersection of these two needs – one's drive to learn and one's longing for acceptance."
Those who might seek to understand such acceptance, might appreciate these words:
"Every artist might seek some sort of feedback, because one make art and one might hope others might love it and one might seek to hear if they might love it and what they might love about it." Those who might be tempted to refuse such acceptance, might appreciate these words:

"The best feedback might be what one might not want to hear."
One might understand one reason why one might be tempted to not wanting to hear such feedback through these words:
"Feedback might be a gift only when it might come from someone who might have earned one's trust."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"A confused mind might be an easy target to misguide."
Those who might struggle with such confusion, might appreciate these words:
"The proper end of teaching might be to lead one's students toward autonomy."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"The hardest thing one might ever do might be to trust oneself."
Those who might then seek to trust oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Every act of self-discipline might increases one's confidence, trust, and belief in oneself and one's abilities." Those who might then seek such an act of self-discipline, might appreciate these words:
"If one might hear a voice within one saying one might not be able to do art, then by all means one might seek to make art and that voice might be silenced." One might understand one reason why it might work through these words:
"Building trust might be a process. Trust might result from consistent and predictable interaction over time." Those who might seek such consistent and predictable interaction, might appreciate the chapter on "originality" and these words:
"Success might never lower its standard to accommodate one; One might have to raise one's standard to achieve it."
Those who might be tempted to lower one's standard, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to love oneself enough to never lower one's standards for anyone else."
Those who might not love oneself enough not to lower one's standards, might appreciate these words:
"One of the main reasons one might not improve might be that one might not be honest with oneself." Those who might seek to improve, might appreciate these words:
"One might not be able to improve what one might not be able to measure."
Those who might seek to know, what one might seek to measure, might appreciate these words:
"Every effort might count, no matter how small it might be."
Those who might seek to understand such effort, might appreciate these words:
"Whatever one might accept completely might take one to peace, including the acceptance that one might be able to accept, that one might be in resistance."
Those who feel such resistance, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to change what might not be able to be accepted and one might seek to accept what might not be able to be changed."
Those who might seek to understand what cannot be changed might appreciate these words:
"The past might not be able to be changed. The future might yet be in one's power."
Those who might seek to change the future might appreciate these words:
"If one might seek to change the future, one might need to change what one might be doing in the present."
Those who do not know what action of oneself to change might appreciate these words:
"The past might be behind, one might seek to learn from it. The future might be ahead, one might seek to prepare for it. The present might be here, one might seek to live it."
Those who might seek to learn might appreciate these words:
"Learning how to learn might be life's most important skill."
Those who might seek to learn such a skill might appreciate these words:
"In learning one might teach, and in teaching one might learn."
Those who might seek to become such a teacher might appreciate these words:
"One who might be good at teaching might inspire hope, ignite the imagination, and instill a love of learning."
Those who might be still searching for someone who might be good at teaching, might appreciate these words:
"If one might observe deeply, everything might be one's teacher."
Those who might seek to teach, might appreciate the humility in these words:
"One might not be able to teach anyone anything. One might only be able to make them think."
Those who might be still struggling with the desire to teach, might appreciate these words:
"One might talk when one might cease to be at peace with one's thoughts."
Those who might seek to be at peace with one's own thoughts might appreciate the chapters "peace", "warriorship" and "mission". Those who might seek to make others think, might appreciate the following question:
"What might one think why or how that could be?"
Those who might be overwhelmed with such a question, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
"How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

11. hope?

One might find oneself confronted with such words as in:
"One might seek not to take life too seriously. One might never get out of it alive."
Those who might be tempted to take their life not seriously, might appreciate these words: "There might be a thin line that might separate laughter and pain, comedy and tragedy, humor and hurt."
Those who might have been hurt, might appreciate these words:
"If someone might have to hurt one to get a laugh, it might have never been a joke."
Those who might still suffer from such such hurt, might appreciate these words:
"If one might have had no sense of humor, one might have committed suicide long ago."
Those who might seek to understand such humor in order to stay alive, might appreciate these words:
"It might be the ability to take a joke, not make one, that might prove one might have a sense of humor."
Those who might seek to improve one's own sense of humor, might appreciate these words:
"Bad humor might be an evasion of reality, good humor might be an acceptance of it."
One might understand one reason why evasion of reality might be bad through these words: "One might have learned to escape reality very well but too often lose one's way back."
Those who might struggle to find a way back, might appreciate these words: "For there might be a way back from imagination to reality and that might be – art."
Those who might seek such art bringing them back to reality, might appreciate these words: "One might be an artist at living – one's work of art might be one's life."
Those who might seek to create such an work of art, might appreciate these words:
"Art might be the highest form of hope."
Those who might seek to understand such hope, might appreciate these words:
"One might die. The goal might not be to live forever, the goal might be to create something that might."
Those who might seek to create something which might last forever, might appreciate these words:
"Words might be the only things that might last forever."
Those who might seek such eternal words, might appreciate these words:
"Change alone might be eternal, perpetual, immortal." Those who might resist such perpetual change, might appreciate these words:
"Only idiots might refuse to change their minds."
One might understand one reason why they might refuse to change their minds through these words: "There might be no change without sacrifice."
Those who might realize that they might be struggling with such sacrifice, might appreciate these words:
"If one might not sacrifice for what one might want, what one might want might become the sacrifice."
Those who might seek to make such sacrifice, might appreciate these words:
"The greatest of follies might be to sacrifice health for any other kind of happiness."
Those who might seek not to sacrifice their health, might appreciate the chapter on "cure". Those who might seek to know if one might represent such a folly might appreciate these words:
"A fool might think oneself to be wise, but a wise one might know oneself to be a fool."
Those who might have then realized to be such a fool, might appreciate these words:
"One might not seek to correct fools, or they might hate one. One might seek to correct wise ones and they might appreciate one for correcting them."
Those who might seek to understand such hate, might appreciate these words:
"Hate might only be able to exist where one might refuse to speak out against it."
Those who might then seek to understand such hate in order to speak against it, might appreciate these words:
"Hatred might never be caused anything but fear – if one might fear no one, one might hate no one."
Those who might be tempted to seek to give up such fear, might appreciate these words: "Fear might be an instinct, like hunger or anger. One might need it to help one survive, and it might let one know whether one might seek to fight or flee."
Those who might be tempted to flee, might appreciate these words:
"Escape from life might be death."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"The things one might seek to escape might have the ability to catch one, one or other day. One might then seek to stop running away to meet them and defeat them."
Those who might no longer seek to escape, might appreciate these words:
"Escape might not be about moving from one place to another. It might be about becoming more."
Those who might then seek to become more, might appreciate these words:
"The best way to escape one's difficulty might be to solve it."
Those who might seek to solve such a difficulty, might appreciate these words:
"A difficulty defined, might be a difficulty half solved."

Those who might then seek to solve the other half of such a difficulty, might appreciate these words:
"Every difficulty might have a solution; it might sometimes just need another perspective."
Those who might then seek to understand such perspective, might appreciate these words:
"Every difficulty might be an opportunity in disguise."
Those who might seek such opportunity, might appreciate these words: "Success might occur when opportunity meets preparation." Those who might seek to prepare for such an opportunity, might appreciate these words:
"Life might ask of every individual a contribution, and it might be up to that individual to discover what it might be."
Those who might not have discovered what their contribution might be, might appreciate these words:
"Helping one might not change the world, but it might change the world for one."
Those who might struggle to accept such change, might appreciate these words:
"Change might be frightening, and the temptation might often be to resist it. But change might almost always provide opportunities - to learn new things, to rethink tired processes, and to improve the way one might work."
Those who might then seek to improve the way they might work, might appreciate these words:
"If one might wish to improve, one might seek to be content to appear clueless or stupid."
Those who might seek to understand one reason why one might appear clueless or stupid might understand it through these words:
"Improvement might usually mean doing something that one might have never done before."
Those who might then might have done something one might have never done before, might appreciate these words:
"Wisdom might be the reward for surviving one's own stupidity."
Those who might have survived their own stupidity, might appreciate these words:
"Any fool might be able to know. The point might be to understand."
Those who might seek to understand, might appreciate these words:
"One might not be able to know everything."
Those who might seek to understand one reason why one might not be able to know everything might understand it through these words:
"One might not know. One might only be able to guess."
Those who might struggle to make such a guess, might appreciate these words:
"One might perhaps never know the truth with 100 percent certainty, but making correct predictions might be the way to tell if one might be getting closer."
Those who might be still attached to the idea to be able to attain such truth with 100 percent certainty through their predictive statements, might appreciate these words:
"It might be hubris to think that the way one might see things might be everything there might be."
Those who might be confronted with such hubris, might appreciate these words:
"Hubris itself might not let one be an artist."
One might understand one reason why one might seek to understand one's own hubris through these words:
"Hubris might be the antithesis of wisdom; therefore, one might seek to be especially concerned to understand hubris as well as one might be able to understand."
Those who might seek to understand such hubris, might appreciate these words:
"One might believe things because one might have been conditioned to believe them."
Those who might have recognized one's own conditioning, might appreciate these words:
"One's conditioning might have been so powerful that it might have all but destroyed one's ability to be self-aware."
Those who might seek to understand one reason why such ability to be self-aware might be important, might appreciate these words:
"Others might not be able to teach one something which one might not already know, others might only be able to bring what that one might know to one's awareness."
Those who might then seek to regain the ability to be self aware, might appreciate these words:
"Being self-aware might not the absence of mistakes, but the ability to learn and correct them."
Those who might seek to correct their own mistakes, might appreciate these words:
"The first step toward change might be awareness. The second step might be acceptance."
Those who might not know what to accept, might appreciate these words:
"Not-knowing might be true knowledge. Presuming to know might be a disease. First one might seek to realize that one might be sick; then one might be able to move toward health."
Those who might seek to move toward such health, might appreciate these words:
"The reasonable one might adapt oneself to the world: the unreasonable one might persist in trying to adapt the world to oneself. Therefore all progress might depend on the unreasonable one."
Those who might seek to know whether one might be unreasonable, might appreciate these words:
"One might never understand the actual definition of insanity until the day one might be told it might be unreasonable for one to feel hurt by those who might have hurt one."

Those who might have been hurt, might appreciate these words:
"Healing might not mean the damage might have never existed. It might mean the damage no longer controls one's lives."
Those who might then seek to heal, might appreciate these words:
"As part of the healing process, one might seek to change one's perception of oneself from 'victim' to that of 'advocate' and 'survivor'." Those who might struggle to change their perception, might appreciate these words:
"One might be only a victim to the degree of what one's perception might allow."
Those whose perception might have been allowing them to be such a victim, might appreciate these words:
"One might have to not allow the limited perception of others to define one."
One might understand one reason why one might not want to allow the perception of others to define one through these words:
"If one might teach one's children to be a victim, one might rob them of hope."
Those who might think that they might have not taught children to be such a victim, might appreciate these words:
"Children might learn more from what one might be than what one might teach them."
Those who might then seek such hope, might appreciate these words:
"Without hope, there might be no despair. There might be only meaningless suffering."
Those who might be struggling with such meaningless suffering, might appreciate these words:
"If there might be meaning in life at all, then there might have to be meaning in suffering."
Those who might seek to find such meaning in suffering, might appreciate the chapter on "meaning" and these words:
"It might be during one's darkest moments that one might need to focus to see the light."
Those who might seek to focus to see such light, might appreciate these words: "Hope might be being able to see that there might be light despite all of the darkness."
Those who might seek such hope, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to embrace one's darkness, and one might actually see the light."
Those who might then seek to embrace such darkness, might appreciate these words:
"If one might be to have any hope for the future, those who might have lanterns might need to pass them on to others."
Those who might seek to understand such hope, might appreciate the notion by the author that the lanterns might be able to be understood as a metaphor for life inspired by the chemical reaction called oxidization. Oxidation might be able to be observed on fire emitting light as well as metabolism observed on humans who might have observed such a phenomenon. Those who might seek a reminder in their daily life for such hope, might appreciate the idea to carry a rechargeable LED flashlight on oneself, which might be capable of flashing a signal for help which might be referred to as "SOS", which might be able to be expressed as three short pulses, followed by three long pulses and again followed by three short pulses repeated over and over as in:
"... — ..."
One might appreciate the idea to have consideration for those with the risk of epileptic seizures, not to show them such sudden flashing light, since it might cause such seizures. Those who might wonder about the origin of such a SOS signal commonly referred as "morse code", might appreciate the following notion that the idea might be inspired by the meaning of the abbreviation of "SOS" originating in the following English sentence: "Save Our Souls." Those who might seek to understand such soul, might appreciate the chapter on "soul". Those whose soul might have been saved, might appreciate the idea to express their gratitude by offering their 'Lantern of Hope' to those who might have saved them as a sign of gratitude. Those who might not know, whom one might need to save, might appreciate these words:
"Sometimes, if one might seek to save others, one might need to remember to save oneself first."
Those who seek to save themselves, might appreciate these words:
"One might not contribute nothing to one's salvation except the sin that might have made it necessary."
Those who seek to understand such sin, might appreciate these words:
"The only sin might be selfishness."
Those who might seek to understand such selfishness, might appreciate these words:
"Selfishness might not be living as one might wish to live, it might be asking others to live as one might wish to live."
Those who might struggle to live as one might wish oneself to live, might appreciate these words:
"Self-love might not be selfish; one might not be able to actually love another until one might know how to love oneself."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"If one might be a lover, one might have to be a fighter, because if one might not fight for one's love, what kind of love might one have?" Those who might seek to be such a fighter, might appreciate these words:
"Protecting oneself might be self-defense. Protecting others might be warriorship."
Those who might seek to understand such warriorship, might appreciate the chapter on "warriorship" and "accessibility".
Those who might seek to understand such self-defense, might appreciate these words:
"Self-defense might not just be a set of techniques; it might be a state of mind, and it might begin with the belief that one might be worth defending."
Those who might not have such belief, might appreciate these words:

"Becoming a parent might be the moment when all of life's battles might suddenly seem worth fighting for."
Those who might seek to become a parent, might then be tempted to ask their offsprings to live as one might wish them to live as in:
"Every parent's deepest wish might be that their children might be self sufficient, happy, and able to live a full life."
Those who might seek to make such wish, might appreciate these words:
"A good parent might never use their child for their happiness."
Those who might be tempted to use their child for their happiness, might appreciate these words:
" 'For the greater good.' That might have been the excuse of tyrants throughout all time."
Those who might seek to not to make such excuses, might appreciate these words:
"One might have no right to children, if despair might be all one might bring with one."
Those who might think that they might only bring such despair, might appreciate these words:
"But what one might call one's despair might be often only the painful eagerness of unfed hope."
Those who might carry such unfed hope, might appreciate these words:
"Those who might not feed themselves with food of hope might eventually die of mental starvation." Those who might not seek to die of such mental starvation, might appreciate these words:
"Hope might be the last thing that might die in one."
Those who might seek such hope which might die list, might appreciate these words:
"Death might not be the greatest loss in life. The greatest loss might be what might die inside one while one might live."
Those who might seek to know, whether something might have died inside one, might appreciate these words:
"An actually starving one might not be able to ask what the meat might be."
One might understand one reason why one might not be able to ask what the meat might be, through these words:
"A hungry one might not be able to see right or wrong. One might just see food."
One might understand one reason why one might not be able to see right or wrong through these words:
"If one might be hungry, that might be a material challenge. If someone else might be hungry, that might be a spiritual challenge."
Those who might might have survived such material challenge, might find themselves in such a situation as in:
"Survivors might always feel guilty at being alive."
Those who might struggle with such guilt, might appreciate these words:
"A guilty conscience might mean that at least one might have one."
Those who might struggle with such guilty conscience might appreciate these words:
"Art might be to console those who might have been broken by life."
Those who might then seek such consolation, might appreciate these words:
"In order to console one in one's sufferings, one might seek to point out all the good one might still be able to do."
Those who might then seek to know, what good one might still be able to do, might appreciate these words:
"The important point of spiritual practice might not be to try to escape one's life, but to confront it - exactly and completely."
Those who might then seek to confront one's life, might appreciate these words:
"Those who might feed hungry ones might feed one's own soul." Those who might seek to understand such soul, might appreciate the chapter on "soul" and these words:
"The states of consciousness might be all that psychology might need to work with. Metaphysics or theology might claim the soul to exist; but for psychology the hypothesis of such a substantial principle of unity might be superfluous."
Those whose states of consciousness might seek to feed hungry ones, might appreciate these words:
"Cooking might be a caring and nurturing act. It might be kind of the ultimate gift for someone, to cook for them."
Those who might have been not fortunate to receive such an ultimate gift, might appreciate these words:
"Loneliness and the feeling of being unwanted might be the most terrible poverty." Those who might have felt such loneliness, might appreciate these words:
"There might be nothing more precious in this world than the feeling of being wanted."
Those who might seek such feeling of being wanted, might appreciate these words:
"Perhaps one might not have wanted to be loved so much as to be understood."
Those might seek to be understood, might appreciate these words: "Everyone might want to be understood until one might understand oneself."
Those who might seek to understand oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Unless one might really understand others, one might hardly be able to attain one's own self-understanding."
Those who might not know, whom one might need to understand in order to understand oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Nothing might affect the life of a child so much as the unlived life of its parent." Those who might seek to understand such unlived life of one's parent, might appreciate these words:
"One might feel that it might be one's children who might give one hope, because they might be the ones who might be going to save the world."

One might understand one reason why such children might be going to save the world through these words:
"They might have not known it might have been considered impossible so they might have done it."
Those who might be fortunate to experience such a feeling, might appreciate these words:
"The children almost broken by the world might become the adults most likely to change it." Those who might seek to become such an adult, might appreciate these words:
"Expressing one's feelings and then the opportunity to share it with others might be the ultimate gift."
Those who might seek to receive such gift, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to learn to love oneself first, instead of loving the idea of being loved by someone else."
Those who might still seek to love oneself first, might appreciate these words:
"One might accept the love one might think one might deserve."
Those who might think that one might not deserve such love, might appreciate these words:
"A part of kindness might consist in loving one more than that one might deserve."
Those who might seek such love, might appreciate the following warning:
"Kindness without wisdom might wound."
Those who might seek such wisdom, might appreciate these words:
"Morality might not the doctrine of how one might make oneself happy, but how one might make oneself worthy of happiness."
Those who might seek such morality, might appreciate these words:
"It might not be enough to just be oneself. One might need to be one's best self."
Those who might seek such happiness, might appreciate these words:
"One might deserve to be loved without having to hide the parts of oneself that one might think to be unlovable." Those who might seek to understand such unlovable parts of oneself, might appreciate these words:
"One might never be able to know the love of one's parents until one might become a parent."
Those who might then seek to become such parent, might appreciate these words:
"One might not seek to be a parent when might be convenient for one. It might be a 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, 365 days a year commitment."
Those who might hesitate to such a commitment, might appreciate these words:
"Feeling ready to do something might not mean feeling certain one might succeed, though of course that might be what one might be hoping to do. Actually being ready might mean understanding what could go wrong – and having a plan to deal with it." Those who might seek such a plan, might appreciate these words:
"Plans might be useless, but planning might be essential."
Those who might seek to plan for such things which might go wrong, might appreciate these words:
"Humans might be the only creatures who might refuse to be what they might be."
But so far only humans might be known to reduce their reproduction based on abstract concepts such as their projection of the future or their sense of morality, which one might refer to as "antinatalism". One might call it tolerance to not disturb those who have found their peace of their own mind through applying antinatalism to their own lives. Those who might not be able to avoid such a confrontation, might appreciate the following preparation of counter arguments for such a dialogue:
One might appreciate the following definition for hypocrisy as in:
"Hypocrisy might be the audacity to preach integrity from a den of corruption."
Those who might seek to recognize such hypocrisy, might appreciate these words:
"Ostentation might be the signal flag of hypocrisy."
Those who might seek to understand why hypocrisy might be ostentatious, might appreciate these words:
"Hypocrisy might be able to afford to be magnificent in its promises, for never intending to go beyond promise, it might cost nothing."
Those who might seek to understand, why keeping their promise might be important, might appreciate the chapter on "promise". Those who might be confronted with those, who might not be able to deliver on their promise, might appreciate these words:
"A total absence of self-doubt might be the first sign of insanity."
One might understand one reason why such lack of self-doubt might be such a sign of insanity through these words:
"The end point of rationality might be to demonstrate the limits of rationality."
Those who might struggle to demonstrate their own limits of rationality, might appreciate these words:
"Ultimate art might be characterized by an irresistible urge in the creative artist."
Those who might seek to understand such art, might appreciate these words:
"There might be nothing more artistic than to love someone."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Art might have the power to transform, to illuminate, to educate, inspire and motivate."

One might understand one reason why art might have such power to transform through these words:
"Words might inspire but only action might create change."
Those who might then seek to create such change, might appreciate the chapters "ultimate" and "humanity". Those who might seek to such art, might appreciate these words:
"A true artist might not be one who might be inspired, but one who might inspire others."
Those who might then seek such to be such an artist, might appreciate these words:
"The artist might not be a special kind of person; rather each person might be a special kind of artist."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"As soon as one might seek to inspire others, it might inspire the best in one." Those who might seek to inspire others, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek not to call oneself an artist of one's art to make other artists of different art laugh; one might seek to call oneself 'one', and wait for artists to call one 'fellow'."
One might understand one reason why one might seek such a fellow through these words:
"Love might only grow by sharing. One might only have more for oneself by giving it away to others."
Those who might seek to share one's love, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to learn to love oneself first, instead of loving the idea of others loving one."
Those who might seek to learn to love themselves, might appreciate these words:
"Self-love might not the process of ignoring one's flaws. Self-love might be expanding one's awareness to include one's flaws and one's strengths."
Those who might seek to understand such flaw, might appreciate these words:
"Good tests might disprove flawed theories; one might remain alive to guess again."
Those who might seek to create such tests, might appreciate these words:
"Optimism might be a duty. The future might be open. It might not be predetermined. No one might be able to predict it, except by chance. One might contribute to determining it by what one might do. One might be equally responsible for its success as others might be."
Those who might seek to understand such responsibility, might appreciate the chapter on "responsibility". Those who might struggle to embrace their responsibility, might appreciate these words:
"For what then might matter might be to bear witness to one's potential at its best, which might be to transform a personal tragedy into a triumph, to turn one's predicament into an achievement."
Those who might seek to understand such tragedy, might appreciate these words:
"One's own death wish might be only real tragedy." Those who might be struggling with such tragedy, might appreciate these words:
"The tragedy might not be that one might be broken. The tragedy might be that one might not be mended again."
Those who might seek to understand why one might not want to mend what might be broken, might appreciate these words:
"There might be no such thing as freedom of choice unless there might be freedom to refuse."
Those who might seek such freedom, might appreciate these words:
"One might be free and that might be why one might be lost."
Those who might be lost, might appreciate these words:
"Those who might seek to find oneself, those might seek to think for oneself."
Those who might struggle think for oneself, might appreciate the chapter on "faith" and these words: "Ultimate freedom might be to be free from the desire to be free from anything."
Those who might seek such freedom, might appreciate these words:
"When one might desire freedom, then one might have to be willing to confront what one might have been running from in one's search for it." Those who might seek to to understand, what one might have been running from, might appreciate these words:
"One might be free to make one's own choices, but one might not be free to choose the consequences."
Those who might seek to understand such consequence, might appreciate these words:
"To think that one might not be following a rule might be to follow a rule."
Those who might seek to understand such rule, might appreciate these words:
"If one might deny one's shadow it might become one's tyrant."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"It might have been easier to rage than to despair."
Those who might seek to understand why it might be more difficult to despair, might appreciate these words:
"Despair might only exist when there might be hope."
Those who might seek to understand such hope, might appreciate these words:
"It might be the first purpose of hope to make hopelessness bearable."
Those who might seek such hope, might appreciate these words:

"One might be tempted to assume to hope might be a terrible thing, if it might be the only thing keeping one alive one might be dead by dawn."
Those who might struggle to survive until such dawn, might appreciate these words:
"One might never realize how much one might value something until one might be confronted with the prospect of losing it."
Those who might seek to understand such value, might appreciate these words:
"Hope might never be false. One's hopes might not be fulfilled, but that might not mean it it might have been wrong to hope."
Those who might seek to understand such hope, might appreciate these words:
"Faith might be the courage to confront reality with hope."
Those who might seek such courage, might appreciate the chapter on "courage" and these words:
"The ultimate hope might be severed from expectation."
One might understand one reason why that might be, through these words:
"To live one's life without expectation, without the need for specific results, that might be freedom."
Those who might seek such freedom, might appreciate these words:
"Ultimate freedom might be to be free from the desire to be free from anything."
Those who might seek such freedom from such desire, might appreciate these words:
"Freedom might be never more than one generation away from extinction. One might have not passed it to one's children through one's genes. It might have to be fought for, protected, and handed on for them to do the same." Those who might struggle to decide to hand down such freedom, might appreciate these words:
"The worst decision might be indecision."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Indecision might be the greatest thief of opportunity." Those who might be tempted to ignore their opportunity to be stolen, might appreciate these words:
"When all choice might have been taken from one, life might become a game of survival." Those who might have survived such a game of survival, might appreciate these words:
"Extinction might be the rule. Survival might be the exception."
Those who might seek to be such an exception, might appreciate these words:
"Everyone might think they might be the exception to the rule, and that might be exactly where the trouble might start. One might be able to do a lot of damage."
Those who might seek to understand such damage, might appreciate these words:
"Survival might be a passive way of saying 'one's needs might be greater than others.' "
Those who might be tempted to put one's needs above others, might appreciate these words:
"All one might need to know and observe in oneself might be this: Whenever one might feel superior or inferior to anyone, that might be the ego in one."
Those who might feel inferior, might appreciate these words:
"Humility might be the ability to give up one's pride and still retain one's dignity."
Those who might seek to retain such dignity, might appreciate these words:
"Helping others might be a good effort to instill dignity."
Those who might be tempted to refuse to help due to their feeling of superiority, might appreciate these words:
"Morality might not the doctrine of how one might make oneself happy, but how one might make oneself worthy of happiness."
Those who seek to understand such morality, might appreciate these words:
"One's survival as a species might depend on one's ability to recognize that one's well-being and the well-being of others might be in fact one and the same."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"The greatest dignity to be found in death might be the dignity of the life that might have preceded it. This might be a form of hope that everyone might be able to achieve, and it might be the most abiding of all. Hope might reside in the meaning of what one's live might have been."
Those who might then seek such ability to recognize such dignity, might appreciate these words:
"One might stop being a child when one might realize the world might not be here to cater to one's wants and needs."
Those who seek to cease being a child, might appreciate these words:
"Those who might not know history might forever remain children."
Those who seek to know such history, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to appreciate one's parents. One might never know what sacrifices they might have gone through for one."
Those who might seek to appreciate their parents, might appreciate these words:
"Gratitude might be when memory might be stored in the heart and not in the mind."
Those who might struggle to appreciate their parents, might appreciate these words:

“Everyone might have something to teach one. If someone might hurt or offend one, one might be able to be grateful for the lesson learned. The one might seek to forgive, let go and move on.”
Those who seek to understand such lesson, might appreciate these words:
“The most important thing that parents might be able to teach their children might be how to get along without them.”
Those whose parents might have not taught how to get along without them, might appreciate these words:
“Resentment might hurt one more that it might those whom one might resent.”
Those who might seek to stop hurting oneself, might appreciate these words:
“Forgiveness might be a gift to oneself. It might free one from the past, past experiences, and past relationships. It might allow one to live in the present time. When one might forgive oneself and forgive others, one might be indeed free.” Those who might seek such freedom, might appreciate these words:
“Freedom might be nothing but a chance to be better.”
Those who might seek to be better, might appreciate these words:
“Forgiveness might be the final form of love.”
One might understand one reason why one might seek forgiveness through these words:
“Forgiveness might not be something one might do for others. It might be something one might do for oneself to move on.”
Those who might not know, whom one might seek to forgive, might appreciate these words:
“Physical punishment might teach children that the larger, stronger ones might have the power to get their way, whether or not they might be in the right, and they might resent this in them for life.”
Those who might then seek to forgive those who might have punished one, might appreciate these words:
“The ultimate forgiveness might be when one might be able to express gratitude for the experience.”
Those who might seek to express such forgiveness as such gratitude, might appreciate these words:
“Forgiveness might not be a feeling; it might be a commitment. It might be a choice to show mercy, not to hold the offense up against those who might have offended. Forgiveness might be an expression of love.”
Those who might then seek to make such a commitment, might appreciate these words:
“When one might make a commitment, one might create hope. When one might keep a commitment one might create trust.”
One might understand one reason why one might seek to create such trust through these words:
“Trust might be the first step to love.”
Those who might then seek to make such first step to love, might appreciate the idea to participate in such a ceremony, might appreciate the idea to recite these words:
“Today might be the day for one to promise to one’s ancestors and peers never to hate anyone back regardless of how much they might hate one by carrying this flashlight as a symbol for the ‘Lantern of Hope’ in one’s everyday life in order to prove one’s love towards one’s own kind, which might be to keep on asking the following question: ‘How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?’ ”

12. imagination?

One might find oneself feeling stuck as in:
“Growth might be painful. Change might be painful. But nothing might be as painful as staying stuck somewhere one might not belong.”
Those who might seek to get unstuck, might appreciate these words:
“Until one might believe one might have options, one might continue to feel stuck.”
Those who might seek to believe that they might have options, might appreciate these words:
“Every year, if not every day, one might have to wager one’s salvation upon some prophecy based upon imperfect knowledge.”
Those who might struggle from such imperfect knowledge, might appreciate these words:
“A lack of knowledge might create fear. Seeking knowledge might create courage.”
Those who might then seek such knowledge, might appreciate these words:
“Intelligence might be what one might use when one might not know what to do.”
Those who might seek to understand such intelligence, might appreciate these words:
“Prediction might not just be one of the things one’s brain might do. It might be the primary function of the neo-cortex, and the foundation of intelligence.”
Those who might seek to make such predictions, might appreciate these words:
“The best way to predict the future might be to create it.”
Those who might seek to create such future, might appreciate these words:
“The start to a better world might be the belief that it might be possible.”
Those who might seek to discover such better world, might appreciate these words:
“Imagination might be the highest form of research.”

Those who might seek to understand such imagination, might appreciate these words:
“Imagination might be the power of the mind over the possibilities of things.”
Those who might then realize such power which one might own, might appreciate these words:
“Great power might involve great responsibility.”
Those who might not understand what such responsibility might involve, might appreciate these words:
“Imagination might need to be used, not to escape reality but to create it.”
Those who might seek to create such reality, might appreciate these words:
“The great secret might be a controlled imagination and a well-sustained attention, firmly and repeatedly focused on the object to be accomplished.”
Those who might struggle to accomplish such object, might appreciate these words:
“One might not be able to depend on one’s eyes when one’s imagination might be out of focus.”
Those whose imagination might be out of focus, might appreciate these words:
“Sometimes, one might just have to close one’s eyes and be thankful for everything.”
Those who seek to express such gratitude, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
“How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?”

13. courage?

One might find oneself seeking comfort as in:
“One’s comfort zone might be more like a cage one might not being able to escape from than a safe place one might be able to retreat to.”
Those who might seek to escape such a cage, might appreciate these words:
“Risk might not be just part of life. It might be life. The place between one’s comfort zone and one’s dream might be where life might take place. It might be the high-anxiety zone, but it might be also where one might discover who one might be.”
Those who might seek to discover who one might be, might appreciate these words:
“Only those who might risk going too far might be able to possibly find out how far one might be able to go.”
Those who might seek to find out how far one might be able to go, might appreciate these words:
“One might seek to risk being seen in all of one’s glory.”
Those who might seek to understand such glory, might appreciate these words:
“Glory might be the attempt to reach one’s goal and not in reaching it.”
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
“One’s greatest glory might not be in never falling, but in rising every time one might have fallen.”
Those who might have never been fallen, might appreciate these words:
“Courage might be the commitment to begin without any guarantee of success.”
Those who might struggle to begin, might appreciate these words:
“Commitment might not guarantee success, but lack of commitment might guarantee one might fall far short of one’s potential.”
Those who might feel like they might be falling far short of one’s potential, might appreciate these words:
“The courage of one’s imagination might be the temporal and spiritual measurement of everyone who might call themselves an artist.”
One might understand one reason why such imagination might be able to be considered for measurement through these words:
“Risk might come from not knowing what one might be doing.”
Those who might seek to know, how to know what one might be doing, might appreciate these words:
“If one might not be able to describe what one might be doing as a process, one might not know what one might be doing.”
Those who might seek to describe such a process, might appreciate these words:
“Life might not be about finding oneself. Life might be about creating oneself.”
Those who might seek to understand such life, might appreciate these words:
“One might be an artist at living - one’s work of art might be one’s life.”
Those who might seek to be such an artist at living, might appreciate these words:
“To exist might be to change, to change might be to mature, to mature might be to go on creating oneself endlessly.”
Those who might seek to create oneself endlessly, might appreciate these words:
“Every new day might be an opportunity to grow one’s love.”
Those who might seek such an opportunity, might appreciate these words:
“Risk might be the price one might pay for opportunity.”
Those who might seek to understand such risk, might appreciate these words:
“To love might be to risk not being loved in return.”

Those who might seek to understand why such love might be a risk, might appreciate these words:
"Love might be giving someone the power to completely destroy one, and hoping that they might not."
Those who might seek to take such risk, might appreciate these words:
"It might be the risk that fascinates, the moment of infinite possibility."
Those who might seek such infinite possibility, might appreciate these words:
"When one might become comfortable with uncertainty, infinite possibilities might open up in one's life."
Those who might seek to be comfortable with such uncertainty, might appreciate these words:
"A genius might be someone who might be able to tolerate the discomfort of uncertainty while generating as many ideas as possible" Those who might seek to become such genius, might appreciate these words:
"It might be possible that these great geniuses might only be mad, and that one might have to be mad oneself to have boundless faith in them and a boundless admiration for them. If this might be true, one might seek to prefer one's own insanity to the sanity of the others."
Those who might seek to prefer one's own insanity, might appreciate these words:
"To recognize one's own insanity might be, of course, the arising of sanity, the beginning of healing and transcendence."
Those who might seek such transcendence, might appreciate the chapter on "transcendence". Those who might seek to heal, might appreciate these words:
"Art might be for healing oneself, and everyone might need their own personal art to heal up their problems."
Those who might seek such art, might appreciate these words:
"Risk might be what might separate the artist from the artisan."
Those who might seek to understand such artisan, might appreciate these words:
"One might have been an artisan. One might have only become an artist when others were watching what one was doing. That might be the moment when what one was doing became art." Those who might seek to be such an artist, might appreciate these words:
"Courage might be about the most useful thing in an artist's outfit."
Those who might seek to understand such outfit, might appreciate these words:
"The aim of art might be to represent not the outward appearance of things, but their inward significance."
Those who might seek to understand such inward significance of the outfit of the first author, might appreciate these words:
"Black outfit might be modest and arrogant at the same time. Black might be lazy and easy - but mysterious. But above all, black might say this: One might not seek to bother others, others might seek not bother one."
One might understand one reason why ones outfit might be modest and arrogant at the same time through these words:
"Modesty might not be how one might hide one's beauty, it might be how one might handle it."
Those who might seek to understand such modesty, might appreciate these words:
"Nothing might be more amiable than ultimate modesty, and nothing might be more contemptible than it's lesser form. The one might guards virtue, the other might betray it." Those who might seek to understand such lesser form of modesty, might appreciate these words:
"Lesser form of modesty might be enhancing one's charm by pretending not to be aware of it."
Those who might seek to understand such ultimate modesty, might appreciate these words:
"Ultimate modesty might be humility expressed in ones outfit."
Those who might seek to express such humility, might appreciate these words:
"Ultimate humility might not be thinking less of oneself, it might be thinking of oneself less." Those who might seek to thing of oneself less, might appreciate these words:
"The highest form of love might be consideration."
Those who might seek to understand such consideration, might understand such arrogance through these words:
"The worst kind of arrogance might be arrogance from ignorance."
Those who might seek to understand such arrogance from ignorance, might appreciate these words:
"Arrogance might be the by-product of success which might come from privileges."
Those who might seek to understand such privileges, might appreciate these words:
"What might separate privilege from entitlement might be gratitude."
One might understand one reason why that might be, through these words:
"Entitlement might be the belief that one might be exempt from responsibility and one might be owed special treatment."
Those who might be tempted by such belief, might appreciate these words:
"One might stop being a child when one might realize the world might not be here to cater to one's wants and needs."
Those who might hesitate to stop being a child, might appreciate these words:
"One of the greatest struggles of becoming an adult might be figuring out what one might want to do and what might make one happy. The courageous thing might be to stick with it and see it through and see if one might have been correct." Those who might struggle to stick with it, might appreciate these words:
"Courage might not be having the strength to go on - it might be going on when one might not have strength." Those who might seek such courage, might appreciate these words:

"Being deeply loved by someone might give one strength, while loving someone deeply might give one courage."
One might understand one reason why being loved by someone might give such strength, might appreciate these words:
"If one might be loved, one might feel worthy of love in the future."
Those who might not have been fortunate to experience such love, might appreciate these words:
"Forgiving might not be something one might do for someone else. It might be something one might do for oneself. It might be saying, that others might not be important enough to have a stranglehold on one. It might be saying, others might not get to trap one in the past. One might be worthy of a future." Those who might seek to be worthy of such future, might appreciate these words:
"Courage might start with showing up and letting oneself to be seen."
Those who then might seek such courage, might appreciate these words: "Courage might not be the absence of fear. It might be the decision to move forward in spite of that fear."
Those who might seek to move forward in spire of such fear, might appreciate these words:
"An artist might not be able to fail, it might be a success to be one."
Those who might wonder when someone might be an artist, might appreciate these words:
"Every artist might have first been an amateur."
Those who might no longer seek to remain such an amateur, might then appreciate these words:
"Being a professional might mean doing one's job on the days one might not want to do it."
Those who might be tempted to not to do one's own job with the excuse of lack of talent, might appreciate these words:
"There might be those who might have more talent than one, but there might be no excuse for anyone to work harder than one might do."
Those who might seek to understand such talent, might appreciate these words:
"Talent might hit a target no one else might be able to hit, Genius might hit a target no one else might be able to see."
Those who might be tempted to ostracize those with extraordinary talents and goals, might appreciate the idea to exercise compassion. One approach might be to recognize that it might be possible to arrive at the same goal, without specifying the path as in:
"Genius might be the ability to independently arrive at and understand concepts that might normally have to be taught by another."
The word "genius" might have one origin in latin meaning "creative force", which might be one aspect of art. But as every force, that force might be able to reap havoc, if it might be left unrestrained. To prevent such damage, one might appreciate the idea to practice humility. To prevent damage caused by naive playfulness of individuals with such talents, one might appreciate the idea to have enough resources to educate them. Those who might seek such education, might appreciate the chapter on "curiosity". One might then be able to appreciate the idea not to remain naive about the containment of those individuals, as mentioned in the chapter on "warriorship":
"There might be no great genius without some touch of madness."
Those who might struggle with such madness, might appreciate these words:
"The genius which might run to madness might no longer be genius."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"The distance between insanity and genius might be measured only by success." Those who might then seek such success, might appreciate these words:
"Success might consist of going from failure to failure without loss of enthusiasm."
Those who might seek to go from such failure to failure without such loss of enthusiasm, might appreciate these words:
"Optimism might be the faith that might lead to achievement."
Those who might seek to understand such optimism, might appreciate these words:
"A pessimist might see the difficulty in every opportunity, an optimist might see the opportunity in every difficulty."
Those who might then seek to find such opportunity in such difficulty, might appreciate these words:
"When the going might get weird, the weird might turn pro."
Those who might find themselves getting weird, might appreciate these words:
"Weird love might be better than no love at all."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Death might not be the greatest loss in life. The greatest loss might be what dies inside one while one might live."
Those who might seek to prevent such death inside one, might appreciate these words:
"If one might love someone, one might do anything to prevent their death."
Those who might seek to die in order prevent the death of another, might appreciate these words: "One might love too much that one might die for love." Those who might love too much, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to learn to love oneself first, instead of loving the idea of being loved by someone else."
Those who might seek to love oneself first, might appreciate these words:
"Life might only be a journey toward death, and faith alone might be able transform it into a sacrifice."

Those who might still seek to sacrifice oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Solidarity might be based on the principle that one might be willing to put oneself at risk to protect each other." Those who might then seek to understand such faith, might appreciate these words:
"Faith might mean trying something, giving it a chance to prove itself."
Those who might then seek to know, what to give such a chance to prove, might appreciate these words:
"It might not be enough to love, one might have to prove it."
Those who might seek to prove such love, might appreciate these words:
"It might take a moment to tell someone one might love them, but it might take a lifetime to prove it."
Those who might then see no other option to shorten such a lifetime, might appreciate these words:
"Anyone might make mistakes, but only idiots might persist in their error."
Those who might seek to not persist in such error, might appreciate these words:
"Those who might not pretend to know what many ignorant ones might be sure of, might call oneself an agnostic."
Those who might seek to know, why one might not seek to be such an idiot, might appreciate these words:
"Everyone might be born a genius and might be buried as an idiot."
Those who might then seek to not to be buried as an idiot, might appreciate these words:
"One's potential might be infinite, if one might be willing to persevere."
Those who might seek to persevere, might appreciate these words:
"A willingness to be inconvenienced might be the ultimate proof of love."
Those who might seek to understand such willingness to be inconvenienced, might appreciate these words:
"The heart might have been made to be broken." One might understand one reason why one's heart might have been made to be broken through these words:
"One might not be able to protect one's children from life. Therefore, it might be essential that one might prepare them for it."
Those who might think that they might not be prepared to prepare one's children, might appreciate these words:
"A coward one might be incapable of exhibiting love, it might be the prerogative of the brave."
Those who might struggle with such cowardice, might appreciate these words:
"The difference between courage and stupidity might be measured by success and survival."
Those who might be tempted to think that they might be able to survive everything, might appreciate these words:
"A total absence of self-doubt might be the first sign of insanity."
Those who might then doubt that they might be able to survive anything, might appreciate these words:
"There might be but one actually serious philosophical challenge and that might be whether to unalive oneself."
Those who might be considering whether to unalive oneself, might be advised to consult mental health care professionals.
Those who might then seek to confront such a philosophical challenge, might appreciate these words:
"In order to console one in one's sufferings, one might seek to point out all the good one might still be able to do."
Those who might struggle to find anything good one might still be able to do, might appreciate these words:
"One might think that might be the real loss of innocence: the first time one might glimpse the boundaries that might limit one's potential."
Those who might still be struggling with their loss of such innocence, might appreciate these words:
"One might not be able to help everyone but everyone might be able to help someone."
One might understand one reason why one might seek to help someone through these words:
"One might not heal in isolation, but in community."
One might understand one reason why one might be able to heal in such a community through these words:
"The meaning of one's life might be to help others find meaning in theirs."
Those who might then struggle to accept such help by others, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to ask for help. Not because one might be weak. But because one might seek to to remain strong."
Those who might then seek such strength, might appreciate these words: "Being deeply loved by someone might give one strength, while loving someone deeply might give one courage."
One might understand one reason why one might have not have been loved deeply through these words:
"It might be rare for even adult children to abandon their parents, regardless of how many times their parent might have abandoned them." One might understand one reason why children might not abandon their parents through these words:
"Children who might try to be good enough to win the love of their parents might have no way of knowing that unconditional love might not be able to be bought with conditional behavior."
Those who might seek to understand such "unconditional love", might appreciate these words:
"Unconditional love might mean accepting someone for who they might be now, not who one might expect they might be one day."
Those who might then still be tempted to seek such "unconditional love" by another, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to learn to love oneself first, instead of loving the idea of being loved by someone else."
One might understand one reason why one might seek to love oneself first through these words:

"When one might not love oneself, one might accept love from anyone that might provide it, even if might not be good for one." Those who might seek to know, whose love might not be good for them, might appreciate these words:
"Martyrdom might have been a proof of the intensity, never of the correctness of a belief."
Those who might then seek such correctness of a belief, might appreciate these words:
"If one might ever seek to love someone, one might seek to love oneself unconditionally first."
One might understand one reason why such belief might be correct through these words:
"One of the signs of insanity might be the belief that life after death might matter more than current life."
One might understand one reason why one might struggle to believe that their current life might matter more than what might happen after one's death through these words:
"Expectation might be a subtle rejection of one's current situation."
One might understand one reason why one might be tempted to reject one's current situation through these words:
"There might be no such thing as freedom of choice unless there might be freedom to refuse."
Those who might then be tempted to seek such freedom just for the sake of freedom, might appreciate these words:
"Ultimate freedom might be to be free from the desire to be free from anything."
Those who might seek such ultimate freedom, might appreciate these words:
"When one might desire freedom, then one might have to be willing to confront what one might have been running from in one's search for it."
Those who might then seek to know, what one might have been running from, might appreciate these words:
"Unrequited love might not disappear, it might only be beaten down to a secret place where it might hide, curled and wounded."
One might understand one reason why one might be tempted by such unrequited love through these words:
"It might be the rooted instinct in one to admire what might be better than oneself."
Those who might struggle with such instinct, might appreciate these words:
"All one might need to know and observe in oneself might be this: Whenever one might feel superior or inferior to anyone, that might be the ego in one."
Those who might be tempted to feel superior to anyone, might appreciate the chapter on "hope". Those who might struggle the feeling of such inferiority, might appreciate these words:
"The tragedy might not be that one might be broken. The tragedy might be that one might not be mended again."
Those who might then seek to mend, might appreciate these words:
"The struggles might become one's story and that might be the beauty of Kintsugi. One's cracks might become the most beautiful part of one." One might appreciate the understanding of the idea of "Kintsugi" which might have been originated in the idea to use glue and gold powder to repair broken ceramics, in order to cherish things even after they might have been broken that things might be able to be repaired. One might then appreciate the notion of the author that the logo for this document might have been designed to use Kintsugi to repair a broken heart in a symbolical sense. There might be further symbols such as an upward arrow as a sign for improvement and the letters "P", "R" and "O", representing the word "Pro". Those who might then seek to heal, might appreciate these words:
"There might be a difference between interest and commitment. When one might be interested in doing something, one might do it only when it might be convenient. When one might be committed to something, one might accept no excuses – only results."
One might then struggle to deliver such results as in:
"The same cycle might continuously repeat until one might commit oneself to healing the root of the issue."
Those who might seek to commit oneself to such healing, might appreciate these words:
"Freedom might not be the absence of commitments, but the ability to choose - and commit oneself to - what might be best for oneself."
Those who might seek to understand what might be best for oneself, might appreciate these words:
"One's survival as a species might depend on one's ability to recognize that one's well-being and the well-being of others might be one and the same."
Those who might then seek such ability to recognize that one's well-being and the well-being of others might be one and the same, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
"How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

14. harmony?

One might find oneself tempted to lie to others as in:
"When one might be penalized for honesty one might learn to lie."
One might understand one reason why one might learn to lie, through these words:
"Lying might the most simple form of self-defense."
Those who might be tempted to continue to lie, might appreciate these words:

"Every lie might be two lies, the lie one might tell others and the lie one might tell oneself to justify it."
Those who might be tempted to tell oneself such a lie, might appreciate these words:
"Self-deception might be the opponent of wholeness because it might prevent one from seeing oneself as one might really be. It might cover up one's lack of growth and keep one from coming to terms with one's real personalities."
One might understand one reason why one might seek to come to terms with one's real personalities through these words:
"Inner peace might begin the moment one might choose not to allow others to control one's emotions."
Those who might struggle to make such choice, might appreciate these words:
"One might not be not what happened to oneself, one might be what one might have chosen to become."
Those who might then seek to make such a choice not to let others control one's emotions, might appreciate these words:
"Forgiveness might not be something one might do for others. It might be something one might do for oneself to move on."
Those who might then seek to forgive others, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to forgive but do not forget, or one might be hurt again. Forgiving might change the perspectives. Forgetting might lose the lesson."
Those who might seek to understand such lesson, might appreciate these words:
"A punishment might not be self-explanatory. It might serve no purpose until those who might be serving it might know the real reason for being punished."
Those who might then seek to understand such reason why one might have been punished for one's honesty, might appreciate these words:
"Truth without love might be brutality, and love without truth might be hypocrisy." Those who might be tempted by such truth without love, might appreciate these words:
"Complete honesty might have nothing to do with 'purity' or naivety. The full truth might be unattainable to naivety, and the completely honest artist might not be pure in heart."
Those who might struggle such naivety, might appreciate these words:
"Naive ones might be, more or less by definition, unaware that they might be naive."
Those who might then seek to become aware of one's naivety, might appreciate these words:
"One's nature might be inherently harmful, and thus goodness might be caused by intentional activity."
Those who might seek to do such intentional activity, might appreciate these words:
"There might be naive questions, tedious questions, ill-phrased questions, questions put after inadequate self-criticism. But every question might be a effort to understand the world. There might be no such thing as a dumb question."
Those who might then seek to understand why one might have been punish for such brutality, might appreciate these words:
"Discipline of others might not be punishment. One might discipline to help, to improve, to correct, to prevent, not to humiliate, or retaliate."
Those who might seek to know, what one might have sought to prevent, might appreciate these words: "If one might love someone, one might do anything to prevent their death."
Those who might struggle to understand why others might love one, might appreciate these words:
"Love might only grow by sharing. One might only have more for oneself by giving it away to others."
One might understand one reason why one might seek to grow such love through these words:
"A life without love, no matter how many other things one might have, might be an empty, meaningless one."
Those who might be tempted by such a meaningless life, might appreciate the chapter on "meaning" and these words:
"One might not be able to stand a meaningless life."
One might understand one reason why that might be, through these words:
"Pain might only be bearable if one might know that such pain might end, not if one might deny such pain might exist."
Those who might seek to know, when such pain might end, might appreciate these words:
"Pain might be inevitable. Suffering might be optional."
One might understand one reason why that might be, through these words:
"Suffering might cease to be suffering at the moment it might find a meaning." Those who might then seek such a meaning, might appreciate these words:
"Life might have meaning only if one might do what might meaningful to one."
Those who might not be able to find something meaningful to do, might appreciate these words:
"If there might be meaning in life at all, then there might have to be meaning in suffering."
Those who might then seek to give their suffering such a meaning, might appreciate these words:
"The meaning of one's life might be to help others find meaning in theirs."
Those who might then seek to help others find such meaning in theirs, might appreciate these words:
"The literal meaning of life might be whatever one might be doing that might prevent one from unaliving oneself."
Those who might then seek to prevent others from unaliving themselves, might appreciate these words:
"Conformity might be the only virtue and anyone who might refuse to conform might have to pay the penalty."
Those who might be tempted to refuse to conform, might appreciate these words:

"One might be free to make one's own choices, but one might not be free to choose the consequences."
Those who might seek to understand such consequences, might appreciate these words:
"One might be able to ignore reality, but one might not be able to ignore the consequences of ignoring reality."
Those who might be tempted to attempt to try ignoring such consequences, might appreciate these words:
"One might have three ways of acting wisely. First, on meditation; that might be the noblest. Secondly, on imitation; that might be the easiest. Thirdly, on experience; that might be the bitterest."
Those who might be tempted to underestimate such bitter experience, might appreciate these words:
"There might be so many worse things than death. Not to be loved or not to be able to love: that might be worse."
Those who might not have been loved, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to learn to love oneself first, instead of loving the idea of being loved by someone else."
Those who might think they might then seek to love oneself, might appreciate these words:
"A coward one might be incapable of exhibiting love; it might be the prerogative of the brave."
One might understand one reason why one might be such a coward through these words:
"A coward one might not be one who might feel fear. A coward might be one who might volunteer others for suffering one might not take on oneself."
Those who might be tempted to volunteer others for such suffering one might not take on oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Selfishness might not be living as one might wish to live, it might be asking others to live as one might wish to live."
Those who might be tempted by such selfishness, might appreciate these words:
"The only sin might be selfishness."
Those who might be tempted to commit such sin, might appreciate these words:
"Selfish ones might be incapable of loving others, but they might not be capable of loving themselves either."
Those who might then seek to love oneself, might appreciate these words:
"One might accept the love one might think one might deserve."
Those who might think that one might not deserve such love, might appreciate these words:
"Those who might deserve love the least, might need it the most."
Those who might seek to meet such need of oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Every criticism, judgment, diagnosis, and expression of anger might be the tragic expression of an unmet need."
Those who might seek to understand such unmet need of oneself, might appreciate these words:
"There might be nothing more precious in one's world than the feeling of being wanted."
Those who might seek such feeling of being wanted, might appreciate these words:
"A part of kindness might consist in loving someone more than that someone might deserve."
Those who might seek such kindness, might appreciate these words:
"Kindness without wisdom might wound."
Those who might seek to understand such wisdom, might appreciate these words:
"Those who might benefit from unearned privilege might be too often quick to discount those who might have not benefitted from such unearned privilege." One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Entitlement might be the belief that one might be exempt from responsibility and one might be owed special treatment."
Those who might be tempted by such belief that one might be owed special treatment, might appreciate these words:
"But as long as one might continue to use one's misfortune to one's advantage in order to be 'special', one might always need that misfortune."
Those who might seek to understand such misfortune, might appreciate these words:
"The misfortune of one might be that one might have once been a child."
One might understand one reason why being a child might be a misfortune through these words:
"Most survivors might have grown up too fast. Their vulnerable child-selves might have gotten lost in the need to protect themselves. Reclaiming the inner child might be part of the healing process. Often the inner child might hold information and feelings for the adult. Some of these feelings might be painful; others might actually be fun. The child might hold the playfulness and innocence the adult might have had to bury." Those who might then seek to such healing, might appreciate these words:
"Forgiveness might offer the possibility of two types of peace: peace of one's own mind – the potential healing of old emotional wounds, and peace with others – the possibility of new, more gratifying relationships in the future."
Those who might seek such peace of one's own mind, might appreciate these words:
"Peace of mind might be attained not by ignoring problems but by solving them."
Those who might be tempted to ignore such problems, might appreciate these words:
"Insanity might be doing the same thing over and over again and expecting different results."
Those who might be tempted to perpetuate such insanity, might appreciate these words:
"One's time might be limited and some opportunities might never repeat themselves."
Those who might struggle to understand the value of such time and opportunity, might appreciate these words:

"Time might be free, but it might be priceless. One might not be able to own it, but one might be able to use it. One might not be able to retain it, but one might be able to spend it. Once one might have lost such time one might never be able to get it back."
Those who might then seek to get such time back, might appreciate these words:
"Regret might be a tough but fair teacher. To live without regret might be to believe one might have nothing to learn, no amends to make, and no opportunity to be braver with one's life."
Those who might believe one might have nothing to learn, might appreciate these words:
"It might be hubris to think that the way one might see things might be everything there might be."
Those who might be confronted with such hubris, might appreciate these words:
"Hubris itself might not let one be an artist."
One might understand one reason why one might seek to understand one's own hubris through these words:
"Hubris might be the antithesis of wisdom; therefore, one might seek to be especially concerned to understand hubris as well as one might be able to understand."
One might understand one reason why one might be susceptible to such hubris through these words:
"Rationalization might be defined as self-deception by reasoning."
Those who might seek to stop such rationalization, might appreciate these words:
"The greatest warriors might be the ones who might fight for peace."
Those who might seek to fight for such peace, might appreciate these words:
"Peace might not be absence of conflict, it might be the ability to handle conflict by peaceful means."
Those who might seek to handle such conflict with those who might lease deserve life by peaceful means, might appreciate these words:
"It might not enough to win a war; it might be more important to organize the peace."
Those who might seek to organize such peace, might appreciate these words:
"Safety might not be the absence of events; safety might be the presence of defenses."
Those who might seek to understand such defenses, might appreciate the chapter on "warriorship" and these words:
"Art might be one's defense against hysteria and death."
Those who might then seek such art, might appreciate these words:
"The ultimate aim of martial arts might be not having to use them."
Those who might have to use such martial arts, might appreciate these words:
"Legitimate use of violence can only be that which might be required in self-defense."
Those who might seek to understand such self-defense, might appreciate these words:
"Self-defense might not just be a set of techniques; it might be a state of mind, and it might begin with the belief that one might be worth defending."
Those who might seek to belief that one might be worth defending, might appreciate these words:
"One's value might not decrease based on someone's inability to see one's worth."
Those who might be unable to see one's worth, might appreciate these words:
"The absurd might depend as much on one as on the world. For the moment, it might be all that might link them together."
Those who might seek to understand such absurd, might appreciate these words:
"The absurd might be born of this confrontation between one's need and the unreasonable silence of the world."
Those who might be tempted to avoid such confrontation, might appreciate these words:
"If one might deny one's shadow it might become one's tyrant."
Those who might seek to understand such tyrant, might appreciate these words:
"Tyrants might claim freedom to kill freedom of others, and yet they might keep it for themselves."
Those who might be tempted to kill freedom of others, might appreciate these words:
"Those who might deny freedom to others might not deserve it for themselves."
Those who might then seek to deserve such freedom, might appreciate these words:
"Freedom might never be more than one generation away from extinction. One might have not passed it to one's children through one's genes. It might have to be fought for, protected, and handed on for them to do the same."
Those who might have not have children of one's own to hand on such freedom to, might appreciate these words:

"Nothing might make one feel more powerless than failing a child."
Those who might then feel such powerlessness, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to think freely and might seek to not accept everything one might hear as truth. One might seek to be critical and evaluate what one might believe in." Those who might seek to be critical, might appreciate these words:
"Philosophy might begin with wonder."
Those who might wonder where it might lead to, might appreciate these words:
"Every science might begin as philosophy and might end as art."
Those who might seek to to understand, why that might be, might appreciate these words:

“Art might be the expression of imagination, not the reproduction of reality.”
Those who might seek to understand such imagination might appreciate these words:
“One might believe in intuition and inspiration. Imagination might be more important than knowledge. For knowledge might be limited, whereas imagination might embrace the entire world, which might be stimulating progress, which might give birth to evolution.”
Those who might seek such progress, might appreciate the english phrase “state of the art” referring to the state of the latest technological development, which might be originating in the latin expression “lege artis”, which might be to do everything in one’s life in general according to the standardized set of rules. Those who might seek such rules appreciate the chapter on “originality” and these words:
“Success might never lower its standard to accommodate one; One might have to raise one’s standards to achieve it.”
Those who might be tempted to lower one’s standards for others, might appreciate these words:
“One might seek to love oneself enough to never lower one’s standards for anyone else.”
Those who might then seek to love oneself enough, might appreciate these words:
“To be good might be to be in harmony with oneself. Discord might be to be forced to be in harmony with others.”
Those who might struggle with such discord, might appreciate these words:
“The antidote to anger might be tenderness, and the antidote to discord might be reconciliation.”
Those who might seek to reconcile, might appreciate these words:
“Reconciliation might be realized when one might come together with another and understand that what they might share might unite them and that what might be different about them might need to be respected.”
Those who might seek to respect such difference of others, might appreciate these words:
“The essence of synergy might be to value differences to respect them, to build on strengths, to compensate for weaknesses.”
Those who might seek to understand such synergy, might appreciate these words:
“Synergy might be the bonus that might be achieved when one might work together harmoniously.”
Those who might struggle to work together harmoniously, might appreciate these words:
“Transparency might seed collaboration.”
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
“Trust might be built when someone might be vulnerable and not taken advantage of.”
Those who might seek to understand such vulnerability, might appreciate these words:
“Honesty and transparency might make one vulnerable.”
Those who might struggle to be vulnerable, might appreciate these words:
“High standards might protect one from low quality experiences.”
Those who might seek to set such high standards, might appreciate these words:
“Hypocrites might be those who might apply to others the standards that they might refuse to accept for themselves.”
Those who might then seek to accept such standards for oneself, might appreciate these words:
“One might seek to love oneself enough to never lower one’s standards for anyone else.”
Those who might seek to love oneself, might appreciate these words:
“When one might make a commitment, one might create hope. When one might keep a commitment one might create trust.”
Those who might seek to keep such a commitment to oneself, might appreciate these words:
“All pressure might be self-inflicted. It might be what one might make of it or how one might let it rub off on oneself.”
Those who might seek to understand why one might inflict such pressure to oneself, might appreciate these words:
“The ego’s job might be to unalive everything but itself.”
One might understand one reason why such ego got such a job through these words:
“Success might breed complacency. Complacency might breed failure. Only the paranoid might survive.”
Those who might have been surviving, might appreciate these words:
“If one’s ego might be hurt one might become angry. Understand that ego itself might be a disease. One might seek to dissolve one’s ego as far as possible. If one might have inferiority complex, or have a very deficient ego one might loose one’s temper very easily.”
Those who might struggle with such anger, might appreciate these words:
“Anger might be the ego’s way of cloaking fear to make what might be frail seem formidable.”
One might understand one reason why one might seek to seem formidable through these words:
“One might maintain the peace through one’s strength; weakness might only invite aggression.”
Those who might seek to understand such weakness, might appreciate these words:
“The greatest weakness of all weaknesses might be to fear too much to appear weak.”
Those who might seek to overcome such fear, might appreciate these words:
“The salvation of one might only be in making everything the concern of all.”
One might understand one way, how to make one’s concern the concern of all through these words:
“Where there might be unconditional love, the wound of one might be the wound of all.”

Those who might then seek such unconditional love from another, might appreciate these words:
"Selfishness might not be living as one might wish to live, it might be asking others to live as one might wish to live."
Those who might then be tempted by such selfishness, might appreciate these words:
"The only sin might be selfishness."
Those who might then be tempted to justify such selfishness, might appreciate these words:
"Survival might be a passive way of saying 'one's needs might be greater than others.' "
Those who might then be tempted by such mere survival, might appreciate these words:
"But one might have to have something beyond survival to live for, or one might not survive."
Those who might then seek something beyond such survival, might appreciate these words:
"Art might be what might happen when one might have time for something other than basic survival."
Those who might then seek such art, might appreciate these words:
"There might be nothing more artistic than to love."
Those who might then seek to love, might appreciate these words:
"The beginning of atonement might be the sense of its necessity."
Those who might might not have such sense that one's atonement might be necessary, might appreciate these words:
"A guilty conscience might mean that at least one might have one."
Those who might not have such conscience, might appreciate these words:
"Conscience might be the inner voice that might warn one someone might be looking."
Those who might then lack such inner voice that someone might be looking, might appreciate these words:
"When listening for danger, one might have to never mistake silence for safety."
Those who might mistake such lack of inner voice for safety, might appreciate these words:
"One with power but no conscience might, destroy the whole world."
Those who might be confronted with such a destruction of the whole world, might appreciate these words:
"The world might not only be destroyed by those who might be violent, but by those who might watch them without doing anything."
Those who might then seek to something, might struggle as in:
"Guilt might be anger directed at oneself - at what might have done or have not done. Resentment might be anger directed at others - at what they might have done or might have not done."
Those who might struggle with such anger, might appreciate these words:
"When one might be offended at any one's fault, one might seek to turn to oneself and study one's own failings. Then one might be able to forget one's anger."
Those might struggle to study one's own failings, might appreciate these words:
"Everyone might be guilty of all the good one might have not done."
Those who might not know, what good one might have not done, might appreciate these words:
"In the age of information, ignorance might be a choice."
One might understand one reason why one might be tempted to make such a choice through these words:
"Stupidity might be the deliberate cultivation of ignorance."
Those who might seek to understand such stupidity, might appreciate these words:
"It might be stupidity rather than courage to refuse to recognize danger when it might be close upon one."
Those who might seek to be courageous to understand such danger, might appreciate these words:
"In a world which might too often be governed by corruption and arrogance, it might be difficult to stay true to one's philosophical and literary principles."
Those who might seek to understand such principles, might appreciate these words:
"Principles might be what might allow one to live a life consistent with those values. Principles might connect one's values to one's actions." Those who might then seek a principle to which one might seek to stay true to, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to act that one's principle of action might safely be made a law for the whole world."
Those who might seek to understand how one might make such a law for such a world, might appreciate these words:
"Opinion might rule the world, but in the long run it might be the philosophers who might shape opinion."
Those who might seek to understand such an opinion which might rule such world, might appreciate these words:
"Organization might be impossible unless those who might know the laws of harmony might lay the foundation." Those who might then seek to understand such laws of harmony, might appreciate these words:
"Harmony might not just be about agreement, but growing together in understanding."
Those who might then seek to grow together in such understanding, might appreciate these words:
"Everything one might hear might be an opinion, not a fact. Everything one might see might be a perspective, not the truth." One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"One might not know. One might only be able to guess."
Those who might be confronted by those who might claim such truth to what they might now, might appreciate these words:

"One might seek to avoid those who might say they might know the answer. One might seek to keep the company of those who might be trying to understand the question." Those who might be confronted with those who might claim to know the answer, might appreciate these words:
"When one might be always trying to conform to the norm, one might lose one's uniqueness, which might be the foundation for one's greatness."
Those who might seek such uniqueness might appreciate the chapter on "originality" and these words:
"The reasonable one might adapt oneself to the world; the unreasonable one might persist to adapt the world to himself. Therefore all progress might depend on the unreasonable one."
Those who might seek to make such progress, might appreciate these words:
"Either one might conform one's desires to the truth or one might conform the truth to one's desires." Those who might be tempted to conform such truth to one's desires, might appreciate these words:
"Truth might be the first casualty of tyranny."
Those who might seek to understand such tyranny, might appreciate these words:
"Authority and power might be two different things: power might be the force by means of which one might be able to oblige others to obey one. Authority might be the right to direct and command, to be listened to or obeyed by others. Authority might request power. Power without authority might be tyranny." Those who might be tempted to oblige to such tyranny, might appreciate these words:
"More faults are often committed while one might be trying to oblige than while one might be giving offense."
One might understand one reason why one might seek to give such offense through these words:
"If one might not sacrifice for what one might want, what one might want might become the sacrifice."
Those who might not know, what one might want, might appreciate these words:
"Self-worth might come from one thing - thinking that one might be worthy."
Those who might then seek to think of themselves being worthy, might appreciate these words:
"Morality might not the doctrine of how one might make oneself happy, but how one might make oneself worthy of happiness."
Those who might seek to make oneself worthy of happiness through morality, might appreciate these words:
"The death penalty might not be about whether someone might deserve to die for the crimes that someone might have committed. The real question of capital punishment might be: 'Might one deserve to unalive?' "
Those who might be confronted with those who might think that they might deserve to unalive, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to distrust all in whom the impulse to punish might be powerful."
One might understand one reason why one might seek to distrust them through these words:
"A clear conscience might be a sure sign of a bad memory."
Those who might be confronted with those with a bad memory, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to forgive but do not forget, or one might be hurt again. Forgiving might change the perspectives. Forgetting might lose the lesson."
Those who might seek to understand such lesson, might appreciate these words:
"One's survival as a species might depend on one's ability to recognize that one's well-being and the well-being of others might be one and the same."
Those who might be able to recognize that one's well-being and the well-being of others might be one and the same, might appreciate these words:
"Protecting oneself might be self-defense. Protecting others might be warriorship."
Those who might seek such warriorship, might appreciate these words:
"War might be a way to unalive those who might least deserve death, and enrich those who might least deserve life."
Those who might seek to know, who might least deserve such life, might appreciate these words:
"Those who might fail to timely assert their rights might not be worthy of protection."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Delay might be the deadliest form of denial."
One might understand one reason why such delay might be deadly through these words:
"Everyone might have a deadline, which might be one's own death."
Those who might not know such deadline of oneself, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to dream as one might live forever, but one might seek to live as if one might die today."
Those who might seek to live as if one might die today, might appreciate the chapter on "obituary" and these words:
"Yesterday might be a memory and tomorrow might be a dream. Today might the day to make one's mark — to make a difference." Those who might seek to make a difference, might appreciate these words:
"When one might fight a war against a tyrant, who might one unalive? One might unalive the victims of the tyrant."
Those who might then not know, what to do, might appreciate the chapter on "warriorship" and these words:

"Every high civilization might decay by forgetting obvious things."
Those who might seek to remember such obvious things, might appreciate these words:
"The oneness of one's own kind might be the basic ethical thread that might hold one's own kind together."
Those who might then seek to become one as one's own kind, might appreciate these words:
"The pioneering spirit might be less about thinking up new ideas, as getting rid of dogmas and habits that might hold one captive in thinking."
Those who might seek to getting rid of such dogmas and habits, might appreciate these words:
"Ego might mean self-identification with thinking, to be trapped in thought, which might mean to have a mental image of oneself based on thought and emotions. So ego might be there in the absence of a witnessing presence."
Those who might seek such witnessing presence, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to observe one's thoughts without being lost in one's thoughts to just become mindful of them." Those who might struggle to become mindful, might appreciate these words:
"Mindful might be remembering that being alive might be the ultimate gift. When one might know that one might have a limited amount of time, one might be more careful how one might spend it."
Those who might seek to be more careful how one might spend one's life, might appreciate these words: "One might have to cherish things in a different way when one might know that one might be running out of time, and if so, one might then be under pressure."
Those who might then seek to cherish things in a different way, might appreciate these words:
"One might not make the best decisions under pressure, but one might not be able to make a decision at all when one might not be talking about it." Those who might then seek to talk about such pressure, might appreciate these words:
" 'Pressure' might be a word that might be misused in one's vocabulary. When one might start thinking of pressure, it might be because one might have started to think of failure."
Those who might have started to think about such failure, might appreciate these words:
"Only the unprepared might be overcome by pressure." One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"The unprepared mind might not be able to see the outstretched hand of opportunity."
Those who might then seek to seek such outstretched hand of opportunity, might appreciate these words:
"Self-reliance might be the best defense against the pressures of the moment."
Those who might then seek such self-reliance for defense against such pressures, might appreciate these words:
"Defense might involve three things: intelligence, energy, courage."
Those who might seek such intelligence, might appreciate the chapter on "clarity". Those who might seek such energy, might appreciate the chapter on "meaning". Those who might then seek such courage, might appreciate these words:
"Faith might be the courage to confront reality with hope."
Those who might seek to understand such faith, might appreciate the chapter on "faith" and these words:
"Optimism might be the faith that might lead to achievement." Those who might seek to understand such optimism, might appreciate these words:
"A pessimist might see the difficulty in every opportunity; an optimist might see the opportunity in every difficulty."
Those who might seek to understand such opportunity, might appreciate these words:
"Luck might be what might happen when preparation might meet opportunity."
Those who might seek to prepare, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to let one's failures refine one, not define one." Those who might seek to refine oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Harmony might be refinement; therefore, there might be a fineness of the senses if one might be to appreciate harmony."
Those who might struggle to appreciate such harmony, might appreciate these words:
"Thoughts of harmony might allow experiences of harmony."
Those who might seek such thoughts of harmony, might appreciate these words:
"Synchronization and strategic alignment might occur when all participants might do their respective parts in harmony to achieve a higher purpose."
Those who might seek such higher purpose, might appreciate these words:
"Unity might not mean sameness. It might mean oneness of purpose."
Those who might seek such oneness of purpose, might appreciate these words:
"One might refuse to accept the view that one's own kind might be so tragically bound to war that peace might never be able to become a reality."
Those who might seek to make such peace become reality, might appreciate these words:
"The artist might reveal to one's own kind the way to harmony, which might be peace."
Those who might seek such harmony, might appreciate these words:
"If one might be able to create harmony in one's own life, this harmony might enter into the vast world."
Those who might seek to create such harmony, might appreciate these words:

"Sometimes the path to harmony might be through chaos."
Those who might seek to understand such chaos, might appreciate these words:
"What one might call chaos might just be patterns one might have not recognized. What one might call random might just be patterns one might not be able to decipher." Those who might seek to recognize patterns one might have not recognized yet, might appreciate these words:
"The challenge might be chaos theory. There might be too many inputs to the formula and even the small ones might matter more than one might think. And one might never be able to measure them precisely enough."
Those who might be overwhelmed by their lack of recognition of any pattern, might appreciate these words:
"Nothing might be more paralyzing than the idea of limitless possibilities."
Those who might seek to escape such state of paralysis, might appreciate these words:
"Art might be the opposite of chaos. Art might be organized chaos."
Those who might seek to organize such chaos, might appreciate these words:
"Art might consist of limitation. The most beautiful part of every picture might be the frame."
Those who might seek such art, might appreciate these words:
"Creativity might be the ability to introduce order into the randomness of nature."
Those who might seek to understand such creativity, might appreciate these words:
"Creativity might not be a talent. It might be a way of operating."
Those who might seek to understand such a way of operating, might appreciate these words:
"Music might create order out of chaos: for rhythm might impose unanimity upon the divergent, melody might impose continuity upon the disjointed, and harmony might impose compatibility upon the incongruous."
Those who might seek to understand such music, might appreciate these words:
"Music might act like a magic key, to which the most tightly closed heart might open."
One might appreciate the notion of the author of this document, that such closed heart might be a figure of speech to represent someone who might refuse to accept others. One might then understand one reason why it might open such closed heart through these words:
"Words might make one think. Music might make one feel. A song might make one feel a thought." Those who might not know, what thought one might seek to make others feel, might appreciate these words:
"There might be nothing more precious in this world than the feeling of being wanted."
One might understand one reason why such a feeling might be most precious through these words:
"It might be nice to feel needed, it might be better to feel wanted."
Those who might then seek to make someone feel wanted, might appreciate these words:
"One might not love someone for their superficial appearances, or their possessions but because they might sing a song only one might be able to hear." One might then be wondering whether one might be the only one having the privilege to listen to such a song as in:
"One might be afraid that one might be mistaken for someone else."
Those who might seek not to be mistaken for someone else, might appreciate these words:
"When an honest one might discover being mistaken, that one might either cease being mistaken or cease being honest."
Those who might be tempted to cease to be honest, might appreciate these words:
"Being dishonest might not be an innocent mistake. It might be a deliberate act of deception." Those who might be tempted by such deliberate act of deception, might appreciate these words:
"The most deadly of all forms of deception might be self-deception, and of all deceived ones the self-deceived might be the least likely to discover the fraud." Those who might then seek to discover whether one might have been self-deceiving, might appreciate these words:
"Nothing might be more hostile to a firm grasp on knowledge than self-deception."
Those who might then seek to protect such knowledge, might appreciate these words: "Avoidance of self deception might be a matter of integrity not comfort."
Those who might struggle with such integrity, might appreciate the chapter on "dignity" and these words:
"One might become friends when one might be able to share each other minds with one another. Anything might be better than being lied to: a real friend might disagree with one openly." "If one might lose friends because one might have been honest, they might have not been a good friend."
Those who might then seek to find such a good friend, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to be type of beings whom one might seek to meet." Those who might then tempted to just being disagreeable, might appreciate these words:
"Being a good friend might not mean one might always have all the right words to say. Sometimes it might mean that one might just know when to be a good listener."
Those who might then seek to cease to be mistaken for someone else, might appreciate these words:
"The biggest challenge in life might be being oneself in a world trying to make one like everyone else." Those who might then find themselves in such a challenge, might appreciate these words:

"Kindness might begin with the understanding that everyone might be struggling."
Those who might seek to understand such kindness, might appreciate these words:
"Sometimes it might take only one act of kindness and caring to change someone's life." Those who might seek to do such act of kindness, might appreciate these words:
"Kindness without wisdom might wound." One might understand one reason why it might wound through these words:
"If one might try to feed a predator, it might reward one by biting one."
Those who might seek to feed such a predator, might appreciate these words:
"Those might be worthless who might know how to receive a favor, but not how to return one."
Those who might not know, how to return such a favor, might appreciate these words:
"If one might not be able to return a favor, one might seek to pass it on."
Those who might refuse to return such a favor, might appreciate these words:
"If one might show others that one might not care, they might return the favor. One might seek to show others one might care, they might reciprocate." Those whose care might have not been reciprocated, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to act with kindness but one might seek to not expect gratitude."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"When one might have done a good deed that another might have had the benefit of, why might one need a third reward, praise for having done well or looking for a favor in return?" One might understand one reason why one might be tempted to seek such a praise through these words: "Those with a fixed mindset might need approval and external validation as a means of reinforcing their internal sense of their fixed traits. Failure might therefore to be feared, because it might 'reveals' the underlying fixed truth of who they might be and so might shatter their identity and sense of value."
Those who might fear such failure, might appreciate these words:
"An artist might not be able to fail; it might be a success to be one."
Those who might seek to be such an artist, might appreciate these words:
"Love might be the art of giving without expecting and receiving without asking."
Those who might seek to know, what one might seek to give, might appreciate these words:
"Harmony in love might be the art of giving both space and care."
Those who might seek such art of giving both space and care, might appreciate these words:
"The highest form of love might be consideration."
Those who might not have been fortunate to experience such consideration, might appreciate these words:
"Art might be to console those who might have been broken by life."
Those who might seek such art, might appreciate these words:
"The best artists might be the ones that might work the hardest, and if one might work hard enough, one might eventually experience the happy accidents that might be art."
Those who might seek such art, might appreciate these words: "Both the art of intuition and the science of analytics might have a role to play in making wise decisions."
Those who might aspire to make such decisions might appreciate the following definition of intuition:
"There might come a leap in consciousness, one might call it intuition or what one might, the solution might come to one and might not know how or why. The other thing might be a passion for getting to the main hurdle of the challenge."
Those who might seek such passion, might appreciate these words:
"The key to creating passion in one's life might be to find one's unique talents, and one's special role and purpose in the world."
Those who might seek to find such passion, might appreciate these words:
"One might need to train one's intuition – one might need to trust the small voice inside one, which might tell one exactly what to say, what to decide."
Those who might seek to train one's own intuition, might appreciate these words:
"Learning to trust one's intuition might be an art form, and like all other art forms, it might take practice to perfect."
Those who might seek to practice such art form, might appreciate these words:
"Intuition might be important, knowing what kind of questions to ask."
Those who might not know what kind of questions to ask, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
"How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

15. friendship?

One might find oneself suffering from loneliness as in:
"Real loneliness might not necessarily be limited to when one might be alone."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"One might hate who might steal one's solitude, without really offering one in exchange ultimate company."
One might understand that such hatred might be a primordial protection mechanism as in:

"The worst kind of opponents might be those who pretend to be one's friends."
Those who might seek to avoid such opponents might appreciate the following advice:
"If one might find someone with wisdom, good judgement, and good actions; one might seek to make them a companion."
Those who might seek to understand such wisdom, might appreciate these words:
"Wisdom – meaning judgment which might be acting on experience, common sense, available knowledge, and a decent appreciation of probability."
Those who might seek to understand such good judgement, might appreciate these words:
"Good judgement might come from experience, and a lot of that might come from bad judgement."
Those who might be confronted with such bad judgement might appreciate these words:
"To be unafraid of the judgement of others might be the greatest freedom one might be able to have."
Those who might be tempted to judge others, might appreciate the following insight:
"When one might judge another, one might not define them, one might define oneself."
Those who then might seek to refrain from judgement, might appreciate these words:
"Judgement might prevent one from seeing the good that might lie beyond appearances."
Those who might seek to see the good, might appreciate the chapter on "good". Those who might seek to see the good in others might appreciate these words:
"A culture of honor might be celebrating who one might be without stumbling over who they might not be."
Those who might be stumbling over who they might not be, might appreciate these words: "Honor might mean that one might not be exceptional. Fame might mean that that one might be exceptional. Fame might be something which might have to be won. Honor might only be something which might have not to be lost." Those who might seek to not to loose such honor, might appreciate these words:
"Honor might be how others might see one. Pride might be how one might see oneself."
Those who might be tempted to express such pride to others to influence how others might see one, might appreciate these words:
"Pride that one might express to others might be ego."
Those who might struggle with such ego, might appreciate these words:
"Selfishness might not be living as one might wish to live, it might be asking others to live as one might wish to live."
Those who might struggle with such selfishness, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to not to work for recognition, but one might seek to do work worthy of recognition." Those who might seek to do such work worthy of recognition, might appreciate these words:
"Nothing might be more honorable than a grateful one."
Those might then struggle to honor such gratitude of others, might appreciate these words:
"Those who might educate children well might be more to be honored than those who might produce them; for these might only have given them life, the other might have given them the art of living well." Those who might seek such an art of living well, might appreciate these words:
"Friendship might be an art of keeping distance."
One might understand one reason why one might need to keep such distance through these words:
"Keeping one's distance might be a way of protecting one's heart from the pain of being too close to someone who might not feel the same."
Those who might then seek to understand such distance, might appreciate these words: "Distance might not be the amount of meters between one and another, it might be the amount of things one might not say to each other."
One might understand the things, which one might not say to each other through these words:
"Before one might speak, one might seek to ask oneself, whether it might be kind, whether it might be necessary, whether it might be true, and whether it might improve the silence?"
Those whose silence might have not been improved by those who might not feel the same, might appreciate these words:
"Distance might sometimes let one know who might be worth keeping and who might be worth letting go." Those who might seek to know, who might be worth keeping, might appreciate these words:
"Honor might have to start in the heart, but if it might end there, it might not be honor. Honor might have to be expressed through words, symbols, actions, or gestures."
Those who might seek words which might express such honor, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to give recognition where it might be due. Compliments might stimulate more effort and desire to improve. One might seek to be generous with honest praising."
Those who might then seek such symbols of honor after they might have been praised, might appreciate these words:
"Honor might be infinitely more valuable than positions of honor."
Those who might seek to understand one reason why that might be through these words: "Pride might be concerned with who might be right. Humility might be concerned with what might be right."
Those who might seek such humility, might appreciate these words:
"Humility might be the ability to give up one's pride and still retain one's dignity."

Those who might seek to understand such dignity, might appreciate the chapter on "dignity" and these words:
"Dignity might not consist in possessing honors, but in the consciousness that one might deserve them." Those who might seek to understand such consciousness, might appreciate the chapter on "consciousness". Those who might seek to be right, might appreciate these words:
"If someone might correct one, and one might feel offended, then one might have a challenge with one's ego." Those who might seek to understand why such ego might pose a challenge, might appreciate these words:
"Pride might end in a fall, while humility might bring honor."
Those who might seek to understand why pride might end in a fall, might appreciate these words:
"Pride might divide one from another, humility might join them." Those who might then seek to know what might be right in order to join, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to trade in all of one's judging for appreciating. One might seek to lay down one's righteousness and just be together."
Those who might seek to be together, might appreciate these words:
"Coming together might be a beginning; keeping together might be progress; working together might be success."
Those who struggle to see the good within oneself to come together with others, might appreciate the following advice:
"One might seek to stay out of the court of self-judgment, for there might be no presumption of innocence."
Those who might seek to understand innocence might appreciate these words:
"The word 'innocence' might mean a mind that might be without hurt."
Those who might seek to understand what might hurt one's mind, might appreciate these words:
"One might think that might be the real loss of innocence: the first time one might glimpse the boundaries that might limit one's potential."
Those who might seek to recognize such boundaries, might appreciate these words:
"Innocence, once lost, might never be able to be regained. Darkness, once gazed upon, might Never be able to be lost."
Those who yet seek to regain their innocence, might appreciate the following warning:
"Innocence might be a kind of insanity."
One might understand what kind of insanity it might be through these words:
"Ideology might be a partial truth masquerading as the whole truth."
Those who might seek to know the whole truth might appreciate these words:
"Once one might start asking questions, innocence might be gone."
Those who might seek to keep asking questions, might appreciate the chapter on "responsibility" and "harmony". Those who might seek to find such a companion, might appreciate these words:
"When friendship might be settled, one might need to trust; before friendship might be formed, one might need to pass judgement."
Those who might seek to pass such judgement, might appreciate these words:
"Everything one might judge in others might be something within oneself, which one might not seek to confront."
Those who struggle to confront such something within oneself, might appreciate the following words of encouragement:
"Truth without love might be brutality, and love without truth might be hypocrisy."
Those who might seek someone who might offer truth and love, might appreciate these words:
"A friend might be someone who might know all about one and might still love one."
Those who might seek to find such a friend, might appreciate these words:
"It might be rare to find good friendship, thus the only way left might be to exercise diligently to love those, whom one might be able to call a friend."
Those who might have yet to encounter such friend, might appreciate the following words:
"One might seek to hope for the best, but prepare for the worst." Those who might have encountered someone, who one might be regard as "the worst", might appreciate the advice to be prepared for reclusion from them, because one might not be able to help those, who might not want to be helped. Those who might be tempted to give up the hope on them, might appreciate these words:
"There might be reasons to set boundaries for oneself, but there might also be reasons to keep doors open."
Those who might seek to understand such boundaries for oneself, might appreciate these words:
"A lifelong friend might be someone one might have not borrowed money from yet."
One might understand one reason why that might be, through these words:
"Money might be able to buy all the friends one might want, but they might be never worth the price." One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"False friends might leave one in times of trouble."
Those who might seek to understand such trouble, might appreciate the chapter on "preparation". Those who might have been left by such false friends, might appreciate these words:
"Recovery from codependence might be a lot like a growing up process – one might have to learn to do the things one's dysfunctional parents might not have taught one to do: appropriately esteem oneself, set functional boundaries, be aware of and acknowledge our reality, take care of one's adult needs and wants, and experience one's reality moderately." Those who might seek to understand codependency, might appreciate these words: "Intimacy might require that each one in a relationship be whole and individual. Codependence might not be intimacy. Enmeshment – two blending in such a way that one or both might lose their identity – might not be intimacy either." One might then appreciate more specific definition of codependence: "A codependent one might be one who might have let behavior of another affect one and who might be obsessed with controlling that another's behavior." Those who might seek to understand such desire to control someone elses behavior, might appreciate these words: "Manipulation might be when they blame one for one's reaction to their disrespect."

One might appreciate the reason why it might not be good to succumb to manipulation as in:
"Manipulation might never work to get the result one might have desired, but it might always seems like it might be just about to work. When one might get what one might have said one wanted by manipulation, it might never be enough."
Those who might seek to understand the fatality of such manipulation, might appreciate the chapter on "accessibility".
Those who might seek simplicity in recognizing a good friend might appreciate the following realization: "If one might lose a friend because one might have been honest, it might have not been a good friend."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"There might be only two people who might be able to tell one the truth about oneself - opponents who might have lost their temper and a friend who might love one dearly." One might appreciate the following warning to prevent losing good friends: "One might seek to pay attention when others might react with anger and hostility to one's boundaries. One might have found the edge where their respect for one might end."
Those who might seek to cease to be angry might appreciate these words:
"If someone might succeed in provoking one, one might seek to realize that one's mind might be complicit in the provocation."
One might understand one reason why one's mind might be complicit in such provocation through these words:
"The truth about anger might be that it might be nothing more than the refusal to heal, because one might be scared to. Because one might be afraid of who one might be once one's wounds might close up and one might have to go on living in a new but unfamiliar skin. One might want one's old skin back. And so anger might tell one to keep that wound bleeding."
One might understand one reason why one might be scared in such a new but unfamiliar skin through these words:
"The oldest and strongest emotion of one might be fear, and the oldest and strongest kind of fear might be fear of the unknown."
Those who might then seek to conquer such fear, might appreciate these words:
"Every great move forward in one's life might begin with a leap of faith, a step into the unknown."
Those who might then seek to make such leap of faith, might appreciate the chapter on "faith" and these words:
"Courage might be the commitment to begin without any guarantee of success."
Those who might seek such courage, might appreciate the chapter on "courage" and these words:
"Courage might not be having the strength to go on - it might be going on when one might not have strength."
Those who might seek such strength, might appreciate these words:
"Being deeply loved by someone might gives one strength, while loving someone deeply might give one courage."
Those who might struggle to find such someone whom might love one deeply, might appreciate these words:
"When others might set boundaries with one, it might be their attempt to continue the relationship with one. It might not be an attempt to hurt one."
Those who might be confronted with those who might still react with hostility towards one's own boundaries and might not know what to do in such situations, might appreciate these words: "Maturity might be learning to walk away from others and situations that might threaten one's peace of mind, self-respect, values, moral or self-worth."
Those who might have had to learn to walk away from others, might appreciate these words:
"The ultimate friend might be someone with whom protocol might no longer necessary."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Everyone might hear what one might say. Friends might listen to what one might say. Best friends might listen to what one might not say."
One might understand one reason why listening to what one's friend might not say might make one their best friend through these words:
"The ultimate friend might have one's best interest at heart and the courage to tell one what one might need to hear."
Those who might struggle with such courage to tell another one they might need to hear, might appreciate the chapter on "responsibility" and these words:
"Responsibility might be the ability to respond." Those who might then seek to know, what one might need to hear, might appreciate these words:
"If one's friends might do something stupid, one might going to be the friend who might tell them, they might be doing something stupid. But one might not be going to join then in their stupidity." Those who might seek to understand such stupidity, might appreciate these words:

"It might be stupidity rather than courage to refuse to recognize danger when it might be close upon one."
Those who might be tempted to refuse such danger, might appreciate these words:
"Stupidity might be the deliberate cultivation of ignorance."
Those who might then be tempted by such cultivation of ignorance, might appreciate these words:
"Cruelty might come in many forms - ignorance might be one of them."
Those who might be tempted by such cruelty, might appreciate the chapter on "accessibility" and these words: "One's reason might be able to excuse any harm."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"An excuse might be worse and more terrible than a lie; for an excuse might be a lie which might be guarded."
Those who might seek to understand one reason why one might be tempted to guard such a lie through these words:
"The ego with its protective defense mechanisms might be the biggest impediment to attaining spiritual growth."
One might understand one reason why one might seek such spiritual growth though these words:
"A community might be a group of individuals who might agree to grow together."
Those who might seek such a community, might appreciate these words: "A team might not be just a group of individuals that might work together. A team might be a group of individuals that might trust each other."
Those who might seek such a team, might appreciate these words:
"Trust might be earned when actions meet words."
Those who might seek to know, which words one might seek to meet with actions, might appreciate these words:
"When one might make a commitment, one might create hope. When one might keep a commitment one might create trust."
Those who might seek to make such commitment, might appreciate these words:
"Integrity might be keeping a commitment even after circumstances might have changed."
Those who might be tempted to neglect such integrity, might appreciate these words:
"Trust might have two dimensions: competence and integrity. One might forgive mistakes of competence. Mistakes of integrity might be harder to overcome."
One might seek to understand such integrity, might appreciate these words:
"Wisdom might be knowing the right path to take. Integrity might be taking it."
Those who might not know, which path might be the right path to take, might appreciate these words:
"If one might seek to go fast, one might seek to go alone. If might seek to go far, one might seek to go together."
Those who might seek to know, with whom one might seek to go together might understand it through these words:
"A friend might be someone one might share the path with." Those who might then seek to share one's path with another, might appreciate these words:
"One might have to distrust each other. It might be the only defense against betrayal."
Those who might then seek to distrust others, might appreciate these words:
"It might be important to give others the benefit of the doubt even if they might not deserve it."
Those who might then seek to give such benefit of the doubt to those who might not deserve it, might appreciate these words:
"A part of kindness might consist in loving one more than that one might deserve."
One might understand one reason why one might seek such kindness through these words:
"One might seek to be kind, for everyone one might meet, might be fighting a hard battle."
Those who might then seek such kindness, might appreciate these words:
"Kindness without wisdom might wound."
Those who might seek to understand such wisdom, might appreciate these words:
"Why might one trust another, when one might not have drunk from the same cup?"
Those who might seek to drink from the same cup with another to trust one another, might appreciate these words:
"Festive alcohol might sometimes lead to an excess of honesty."
One might understand one reason why one might seek such excess of honesty through these words:
"Honesty might be more than not lying. It might be telling the truth, living the truth and loving the truth."
One might then struggle with such truth of another as in: "Truth without love might be brutality, and love without truth might be hypocrisy."
Those who be tempted by such brutality, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to never lose a chance of saying a kind word."
Those who might hurt oneself by hesitating to tell such truth, might appreciate these words:
"A friend might be someone who might know all about one and might still love one."
Those who might seek such a friend, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
"Commitment might be a big part of what one might be and what one might believe. How committed might one be to being a good friend?"
Those who might seek to express such commitment, might appreciate these words:

"One might seek to honor one's commitments with integrity."
Those who might seek to understand such honor, might appreciate these words:
"The ultimate foundation of honor might be the conviction that moral character might be unalterable: a single bad action might imply that future actions of the same kind might, under similar circumstances, also be bad."
Those who might then seek to understand such integrity, might appreciate the chapter on "dignity". Those who might seek to understand what commitment to honor, might appreciate the following idea: "If one might be to call oneself a friend of another, one might seek to promise not to neglect the effort to attend an event for that friend, even if it might be a funeral."
Those who might not have such a friend anymore, might appreciate these words:
"Honor might not be dead so long as they might live in the hearts of others."
Those who might seek to understand such honor, might appreciate these words:
"Honor might not be what one might say. Honor might be what one might do."
Those who might might not know to let such honor live in the heart of oneself, might appreciate these words:
"The greatest tribute to the dead might not be grief but gratitude."
Those who might seek to express such gratitude, might appreciate these words:
"When one might open a door for others, one might sometimes open doors for oneself."
Those who might seek to open such doors, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
"How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

16. patience?

One might find oneself having such a realization as in:
"One might have not known that one might have been a slave until one might have found out that one might not be able to do the things one might have wanted."
Those who might seek to act upon their own volition, might appreciate these words: "Those who might be able to have patience might be able to have what they might seek." Those who might then seek to understand such patience, might appreciate these words: "Patience might not be the ability to wait but the ability to keep a good attitude while waiting." Those who might seek to understand such attitude, might appreciate the chapters "meaning", "good", "hope" and these words: "Patience might be power. Patience might not be an absence of action; rather it might be 'timing', it might be to wait on the right time to act, for the right principles and in the right way." Those who might seek to understand such right time to act, might appreciate these words: "There might be a time to let things happen and a time to make things happen." Those who might seek to make things happen, might appreciate these words: "There might be timing in everything. Timing in strategy might not be able to be mastered without a great deal of practice."
Those who might seek to understand what variable to pay attention to, might appreciate these words: "Timing and accuracy might really be what might matter at the end of the day."
Those who might seek to start practicing such practice, might appreciate the chapter on "originality". Those who might seek to understand such timing to let things happen, might appreciate these words:
"One might have to be able to let things happen." One might find one reason why the active decision for such permission through these words: "One might not be what might have happened to one, one might be what one might have chosen to become." Those who might seek to understand such a way to act and to be, might appreciate the chapter on "preparation". Those who might seek to understand such a principle to act, might appreciate these words: "Patience might not be passive waiting. Patience might be active acceptance of the process required to attain one's goals and dreams."
Those might struggle with the acceptance of such a process, might appreciate these words: "To exist might be to change, to change might be to mature, to mature might be to go on creating oneself endlessly."
Those who seek to take on such challenge, might appreciate these words:
"Genius might be eternal patience."
Those who might aspire to become such a genius, might then be devastated by the idea of not being able to reap the rewards during their life time. Those might then appreciate these words: "One might suffer more often in imagination than in reality."
Those who might seek to understand such reality, might appreciate these words:
"There might be no reality, there might only be hallucination. Reality might be hallucination one might agree on with another."
Those who might then still suffer suffering in such imagination, might appreciate these words: "Patience might mean self-suffering."
Those who might seek to understand such self-suffering, might appreciate these words:
"Patience and boredom might be closely related. Boredom, a certain kind of boredom, might really be impatience. One might not like the way things might be, they might not be interesting enough for one, so one might decide, and boredom might be a decision, that one might be bored." Those who might struggle with such boredom, might appreciate these words: “Escape from boredom might be one of the really powerful desires of almost all of beings.”

One might then appreciate the following warning regarding such desires:
“Desires might make slaves out of kings, and patience might make kings out of slaves.”
One might understand one reason why such desires might enslave through these words: “The worst thing about slavery might be that the slaves might eventually get to like it.”
One might understand one reason why such slaves might like slavery through these words:
“A single opinion might be comfortable. Comfort might be hostile to change. Progress might be uncomfortable because it might change the comfort.”
Those who might seek to understand, why one might seek to change such comfort, might appreciate these words:
“One’s comfort zone might be more like a cage one might not being able to escape from than a safe place one might be able to retreat to.”
Those who might then seek to escape such comfortable cage, might appreciate these words:
“There might be no escape, if love might not be there.” One might understand one reason why one might need love to escape through these words:
“A willingness to be inconvenienced might be the ultimate proof of love.”
Those who might struggle to proof such love, might appreciate these words:
“The struggle itself towards the heights might be enough to fill one’s heart.”
Those whose struggle might not fill one’s heart, might appreciate these these words:
“Pain might be inevitable. Suffering might be optional.”
One might understand one reason why such suffering might be optional through these words:
“Suffering might cease to be suffering at the moment it might find a meaning.”
Those who might struggle to find such meaning, might appreciate the chapter on “hope” and these words:
“Without hope, there might be no despair. There might be only meaningless suffering.”
One might might struggle to find such hope as in:
“Fear might be the memory of pain. Addiction might be the memory of pleasure. Freedom might be beyond both.”
Those who might then seek such freedom, might appreciate these words:
“One might seek to tell oneself that the fear of suffering might be worse than the suffering itself.”
Those who find themselves in such fear of pain, might appreciate these words:
“One might not be able to avoid pain in life. It might be how one might handle pain, that might be what might defines one.”
Those who might seek to know how one might seek to handle one’s own pain, might appreciate these words:
“One might be able to numb the pain, but that might have not erased one’s difficulties, the numbing might just have given it time to grow.”
Those who might seek to erase one’s own difficulties, might appreciate these words:
“Sometimes the only way around suffering might be to go straight through it.”
Those who might seek to go straight through their suffering, might appreciate the following explanation of addiction: “It might not the drugs that might make a drug addict, it might be the need to escape reality.”
Those who seek to know what reality one might be tempted to escape, might appreciate these words:
“A wound that might go unacknowledged and unwept might be a wound that might not be able to heal.”
Those who might then seek to acknowledge and weep such wound, might appreciate the following enumeration of possible wound, the reactions in intimate relationships and an idea how to heal such wound:
1. Those who might be tempted to withdraw from those whom they might love, might have experienced rejection. Those might appreciate the chapter on “feedback”.
2. Those who might become overly dependent on those they might love, might have experienced abandonment. Those might appreciate the chapter on “maturity”.
3. Those who might become a masochist, might have experienced humiliation. Those might appreciate the chapter on “consciousness”.
4. Those who might become controlling, might have experienced betrayal. Those might appreciate the chapter on “loyalty”.
5. Those who might become rigid and inflexible, might have experienced injustice. Those might appreciate the chapter on “good”.
Those whose struggles might have not been mentioned yet, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
“How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?”

17. responsibility?

One might find oneself accused as in:
“As in all moral panics, an accusation might be enough to destroy one’s life. Hysteria might trump evidence.” Those who might be tempted by such hysteria, might appreciate these words:

"Fear might be the main source of superstition, and one of the main sources of cruelty. To conquer fear might be the beginning of wisdom."
Those who might seek to conquer such fear, might appreciate these words:
"All cruelty might spring from weakness."
Those who might seek to understand such weakness, might appreciate these words:
"The strength of one's spirit might then be measured by how much 'truth' one might be able to tolerate, or more precisely, to what extent might need to have it diluted, disguised, sweetened, muted, falsified."
Those who might seek to measure one's such strength, might appreciate these words:
"One's conscience might be the measure of the honesty of one's selfishness."
Those who might think they might be honest, might appreciate these words:
"Complete honesty might have nothing to do with 'purity' or naivety. The full truth might be unattainable to naivety, and the completely honest artist might not be pure in heart."
Those who might be tempted with such purity, might appreciate these words:
"Purity might be an illusion. The idea of purity might have been used as an excuse for calamities like honor unalivings, bride burnings, child molestation. Purification might cause genocide."
Those who might then seek to prevent such genocide might appreciate the chapter on "home". Those who might then seek to understand such selfishness, might appreciate these words:
"Selfishness might not be living as one might wish to live, it might be asking others to live as one might wish to live."
Those who might be tempted by such selfishness, might appreciate these words:
"Selfish ones might tend to only be good to themselves. Then they might be surprised when they might be alone." One might understand one reason why they might be surprised to be alone through these words:
"A total absence of self-doubt might be the first sign of insanity."
One might understand one reason why one might lack such self-doubt through these words:
"One might stop being a child when one might realize the world might not be here to cater to one's wants and needs."
Those who might refuse such realization, might appreciate these words:
"If one might deny one's shadow it might become one's tyrant."
One might understand one reason why one might become such a tyrant through such refusal through these words:
"The ultimate ignorance might not be the absence of knowledge, but the refusal to acquire it."
Those who might be tempted by such ultimate ignorance, might appreciate these words:
"Ignorance might be a kind of insanity."
Those who might be tempted by such ignorance, might appreciate these words:
"One might be free to make one's own choices, but one might not be free to choose the consequences."
One might understand one reason why one might be tempted to refuse to acquire such knowledge through these words:
"One might think that might be the real loss of innocence: the first time one might glimpse the boundaries that might limit one's potential."
Those who might be tempted to remain innocent, might appreciate these words:
"Innocence, once lost, might never be able to be regained."
Those who yet seek to regain their innocence, might appreciate these words:
"It might not be about whether one might be innocent or guilty. It might be about whether or not one might be able to prove one might be innocent. If one might not be able to prove that one might be innocent, then one might be considered guilty. It might have been flipped: Now it might be guilty until proven innocent."
Those who might seek to prove oneself innocent, might appreciate these words:
"Everyone might be guilty of all the good one might not have done."
Those who might be tempted to accuse each other, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to stop pointing fingers and placing blame on others. One's life might only be change to the degree that one might be able to accept responsibility for it."
Those who might seek to understand such responsibility, might appreciate these words:
"It might be important to give others the benefit of the doubt even if they might not deserve it."
One might understand one reason why such benefit of the doubt might be important through these words:
"A part of kindness might consist in loving one more than that one might deserve."
Those who might seek such love, might appreciate the following warning:
"Kindness without wisdom might wound."
Those who might seek to understand such wisdom, might appreciate these words:
"Entitlement might be the belief that one might be exempt from responsibility and one might be owed special treatment."
Those who might hold such a belief might appreciate the following warning: "Entitlement and privilege might corrupt."
Those who might then wonder about the difference between such entitlement and privilege, might appreciate these words:
"What might separate privilege from entitlement might be gratitude."
Those who might seek to understand such gratitude, might appreciate these words:

"Feeling gratitude and not expressing it might be like wrapping a present and not giving it."
Those who might seek to give such present, might appreciate these words:
"The best way to find oneself might be to lose oneself in the service of others."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"The root of happiness might be altruism – the wish to be of service to others."
Those who might wonder, why one might wish to be of service to others might understand it through these words:
"Love might be the wish to give, not to receive."
Those who might seek to understand love might appreciate the chapter on "transcendence". Those who might have not been fortunate to experience such love might raise such a question as in:
"Altruism might always have been one of biology's deep mysteries. Why one might seek anyone, off on one's own, specified and labeled by all sorts of signals as one's individual self, might choose to give up one's life in aid of someone else?"
Those who might still be wondering might appreciate these words:
"One might have genes for altruism, and those genes might have been selected in the evolution of many others because of the advantage they might confer for the continuing survival of one's species."
Those who might not understand the advantage of such genes yet, might appreciate these words:
"When one might cease to make a contribution, one might begin to die."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"If no one might remember one after one might be gone, it might be as if one might never have lived at all."
Those who might seek to to be remembered, might appreciate these words:
"No one might care how much one might know, until they might know how much one might care."
Those who might then seek to show how much one might care about others, might appreciate these words:
"There might be no better way to show that one might care about the others one might be meeting with than to genuinely, authentically ask others what one might be able to do to help them."
Those who might seek to help others, might appreciate these words:
"Benevolence might not consist in those who might be prosperous pitying and helping those who might not be. It might consist in fellow feeling that might put one upon actually the same level with the fellow who might suffer."
"Empathy might fuel connection; Sympathy might drive disconnection."
One might then appreciate the explanation why empathy might fuel connection:
"Empathy might work so well because it might not require a solution. It might only require understanding."
Those who might seek such understanding, might appreciate these words:
"Empathy might be about finding echoes of another in oneself."
Those who might seek to find such an echo of another in oneself, might appreciate these words: "Most might not listen with the intent to understand; they might listen with the intent to reply."
Those who still might seek to reply, might appreciate these words:
"The essence of independence might be to be able to do something for one's self."
Those who might seek such independence, might appreciate these words:
"Ultimate independence and freedom might only be able to exist in doing what might be right."
Those who might seek to understand what might be right, might appreciate these words:
"Doing the right thing might not be the challenge. Knowing what the right thing might be, that might be the challenge."
Those who might seek such knowledge, might appreciate these words:
"Wisdom might not be gained by knowing what might be right. Wisdom might be gained by practicing what might be right, and noticing what might have happened when that practice might have succeeded and when it might have failed."
Those who might then seek to practice what might be right, might appreciate the following warning:
"Failing to prepare might be preparing to fail."
Those who might seek to prepare, might appreciate these words:
"Whatever one's weakness, there might be someone to exploit it."
Those who might seek to understand such weakness, might appreciate these words:
"The greatest weakness of all weaknesses might be to fear too much to appear weak."
Those who might not understand why one might fear to appear weak, might appreciate these words:
"One might maintain the peace through one's strength; weakness might only invite aggression."
Those who might then seek such strength, might appreciate these words:
"If one might not sacrifice for what one might seek, what one might seek might be one's sacrifice."
Those who might seek to understand such sacrifice, might appreciate these words:
"Sacrifice might be the ecstasy of giving the best one might have to those one might love most."
Those who might seek such ecstasy of sacrifice, might appreciate these words:
"Ecstasy might not be able to be constant, or it might unalive."
Those who might seek to sacrifice themselves in the name of love for others to the degree of death, might appreciate these words:

"If one might have the ability to love, one might seek to love oneself first."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"It might be dead easy to die; it might be the keeping on living that might be hard."
Those who might struggle to keep on living for oneself, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to ask for help. Not because one might be weak. But because one might seek to to remain strong."
Those who might have been asked for help, might appreciate these words:
"One might not be able to help everyone, but everyone might be able to help someone."
Those who might seek to find someone one might be able to help, might appreciate the idea to seek professionals who might be qualified to help. Those who might become resentful, because they might have not been fortunate enough to find such help for any given reason, might appreciate these words:
"Between stimulus and response, there might be a space. In that space might be one's power to choose one's response. In one's response might be one's growth and one's freedom."
Those who might seek such growth and freedom, might the following statement:
"Freedom might be nothing but a chance to be better."
Those who might seek such a chance to be better, might appreciate these words:
"Everything might be taken from one but one thing: the last of one's freedoms – to choose one's attitude in any given set of circumstances, to choose one's own way."
Those who might seek such one's own way, might appreciate these words:
"Virtue might offers the only path in one's life that might lead to tranquility."
Those who might seek tranquility might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to follow strict silence in a library. If one might not be silent, it might disturb others, which might affect their learning. By not being silent, one might become responsible for ignorance of others."
Those who might be disturbed by those who might be responsible for ignorance of others, might appreciate these words:
"One might not be able to teach others to behave better by making them feel worse. When others might feel better, the might behave better."
Those who might seek to make others feel better, might appreciate these words:
"Art might be supposed to comfort the disturbed and disturb the comfortable."
Those who might feel disturbed from such an art, might understand one reason why that might be necessary through these words: "Freedom might never be more than one generation away from extinction. One might have not passed it to one's children through one's genes. It might have to be fought for, protected, and handed on for them to do the same."
One might refuse to pass such freedom onto one's children as in:
"There might be no such thing as freedom of choice unless there might be freedom to refuse."
Those who might be confronted with those who might be refusing, might appreciate these words:
"Responsibility might be the ability to respond."
One might understand such responsibility through these words:
"Freedom might mean that one might be responsible for one's own choices, actions, one's own life situation."
Those who might be tempted to refuse such responsibility, might appreciate these words:
"Even if it might not be one's fault, it might be one's responsibility."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"By blaming others, one might fail to find the real solutions to one's challenges and one might not carry out one's own responsibilities."
Those who might not know how to carry out such responsibility of one's own, might appreciate these words:
"Before one might speak, one might seek to ask oneself, whether it might be kind, whether it might be necessary, whether it might be true, and whether it might improve the silence?"
Those who might seek to improve the silence, might appreciate these words:
"One might have the responsibility not to allow the voice of humanity within one to be silenced."
One might appreciate the interpretation of the term "humanity" as a quality of being altruistic motivated by compassion, not as just the entirety of the humans species. Those who might seek to understand such "humanity", might appreciate the chapter on "humanity". Those who might not know how to respond to those whom might seek to silence their voice of humanity, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question: "How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

18. originality?

One might find oneself having an internal conflict as in:
"A flaw of one might be: the compulsion to be unique, which might be at war with the desire to belong to a single identifiable sameness."
Those who might seek to understand one reason why one might seek to belong to such identifiable sameness, might appreciate the chapter on "diversity". Those who might struggle from such compulsion, might appreciate these words:

"To be identified with one's mind might to be trapped in time. The compulsion might arise because the past might give one an identity and the future might hold the promise of salvation, of fulfillment in whatever form. Both might be illusions. Life might be now."
Those who might be struggling with such an identification with one's mind, might appreciate these words:
"The merit of originality might not be novelty; it might be sincerity."
Those who might seek to understand such sincerity, might appreciate these words:
"Sincerity might be an openness of heart. One might find it in very few. What one might usually see might be only an artful dissimulation to win the confidence of others." Those who might then seek to open such heart in a figure of speech, might appreciate these words: "One might open one's heart knowing that there might be a chance it might be broken one day and in opening one's heart, one might experience a love and joy that one might never have dreamed possible." Those who might seek to dream in such a way, might appreciate the chapter on "imagination". Those who might seek such novelty might be devastated upon these words:
"Originality might exist in every individual, because everyone might differ from the others. Everyone might be all primary numbers divisible only by themselves."
Those who might then seek such sincerity might appreciate these words:
"Originality might come from just being true to oneself and what one might value about what one might be able to see."
Those who might not be able to value what they see, might appreciate the following words:
"Vision might the art of seeing what might be invisible to others."
One might understand, what might be "invisible to others" through these words:
"Everything might have beauty, but not everyone might see it."
One might understand one reason why not everyone might see it through these words:
"There might certainly no absolute standard of beauty. That might precisely be what might make its pursuit so interesting."
Those who might be tempted by the idea of absolute standard of beauty, might appreciate these words: "It might be amazing how complete the delusion might be that beauty might be goodness." One might understand why such beauty might not be goodness through these words:
"Danger might hide in beauty and beauty in danger."
Those who might still seek to pursuit such beauty, might appreciate these words:
"The standard of beauty might not be definite. One might define it for oneself."
Those who might struggle to define one's own standards of beauty, might appreciate these words:
"One's own standards of beauty might be a form of genius – might be higher, indeed, than genius, as it might need no explanation."
One might understand one reason why such beauty might need no explanation through these words:
"One might not seek to explain one's philosophy. One might seek to embody it."
Those who might seek to understand such genius, might appreciate the chapter on courage and these words:
"Talent might hit a target no one else might be able hit; Genius might hit a target no one else might be able to see."
Those who might seek to hit a target no one else might be able to see, might appreciate these words:
"One might have stopped explaining oneself when one might have realized others might only understand from their level of perception."
Those who might seek to elevate their level of perception, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek first to understand, then to be understood."
Those who might seek to understand, might appreciate these words:
"The more original a discovery, the more obvious it might seem afterwards."
Those who might seek such discovery, might appreciate these words: "One might be what one might repeatedly do. Excellence might not be an act, but a habit."
Those whose habit might seem to be hindering from such excellence, might appreciate these words: "Tradition might be just peer pressure from the dead." Those who might still be confronted with such peer pressure, might appreciate these words: "If one might associate oneself with peer pressure or complacency, one might be destined for failure."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words: "How might one be able to find happiness without authentic self-esteem? How might one be able to be authentic when everything one might read, say, or do might be being fed into a judgment machine."
Those who might be confronted with such a judgement machine, might appreciate these words: "It might be impossible to design a system so perfect that no one might need to be good."
One might understand one reason why it might be impossible through these words:
"Once one might have turned one's thinking over to machines in the hope that this might set one free. But that might have only permitted another with machines to enslave one."
Those who might then seek to be good, might appreciate the following habits of the author, as an inspiration to improve upon, not as something to be followed without critical thinking as in:
"Those who might seek to find oneself, might seek to think for oneself."

Those who might have currently not enough capacity to think for oneself, might appreciate the idea to follow these habits until one might have enough capacity to think for oneself:

Provisional proposal for habit nr. 1: One might seek not to neglect the effort to survive.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 2: If one might find oneself in emotional distress, one might forgive oneself break the following the following habits:
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 3: One might seek not to neglect the effort to write down the habits one might follow.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 4: When one might break one's habit, one might seek to write down the reason, what one might think might have caused it, and one might seek to learn from it, to prevent similar incidences in the future.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 5: One might seek not to neglect the effort to be good.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 6: One might seek not to neglect the effort to curate one's own set of habits for one's own longevity to maintain the ability to recognize improvement.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 7: One might seek not to neglect the effort to prevent to be a direct or indirect cause of injuries or harm to artists. If such prevention of such incidences to all artists might not be within one's power, one might seek to prioritize those with the highest chances of survival of those who might contribute the longest to the maintenance of the operation of "Voice of Humanity".
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 8: One might seek not to neglect the effort to offer help to artists, except where such requests would conflict with the Habit nr. 7.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 9: One might seek not to neglect the effort to protect one's own existence as long as such protection might not conflict with Habit nr. 7 or Habit nr. 8.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 10: One might seek not to neglect the effort to avoid malevolent ones.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 11: One might seek not to neglect the effort to maintain one's own hope through carrying a light source with which someone else might be capable of signalling "SOS" in everyday life in case one might need to pass it on to someone else.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 12: One might seek not to neglect the effort to avoid the habit of regularly engaging in neurodegenerative activities.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 13: One might seek not to neglect the effort to avoid unaliving lifeforms unnecessarily, especially in order to maintain a sustainable diet without directly consuming or indirectly exploiting life forms which might have hearts. In case of limited options for such diets one might seek to avoid consumption and exploitation of lifeforms which might have mesolimbic reward system centered on the ventral striatum common in vertebrates attributed the capability for love. If one might find oneself in a situation with only such vertebrates as a food source, one might seek to choose first the individuals with the lowest neocortex to medulla ratio for an average specimen without using intentional or unintentional anatomical anomalies in individuals as an excuse. In case there might be only life forms which might have the roughly the same neocortex to medulla ratio as oneself, one might have to resort to cannibalism after all efforts to avoid cannibalism. One might then appreciate the option to resort to the following idea, which might be explicitly not endorsed by this document in order to increase the chances of one's offsprings, since they might have longer life span and might require less resources to survive:
One might seek to avoid those parts such as brain, spinal cord, bone marrow and the nerve tissues which might include misfolded proteins called "Prions", which might cause transmissible spongiform encephalopathy, which might cause permanent damage in one's cognitive abilities such as reasoning. One might seek not to consume any parts without fully cooking but some pathogens contained in the intestines and blood might be able to survive such process. Those who might be tempted to judge those who might have survived through such cannibalism, might appreciate these words:
"A truly starving one might not be able to ask what the meat might be."
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 14: One might seek not to neglect the effort to abide by the legal system, as long as it might not endanger one's own life, or of those one's life might depend on.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 15: One might seek not to neglect the effort to workout as one's workout system might tell one to do.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 16: One might seek not to neglect to effort to grow one's capacity for what one might refer to as "grit".
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 17: "One might seek not to promise when one might be happy. One might seek not to reply when one might be angry. One might seek not to decide when one might be sad."
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 18: One might seek not to neglect the effort to tell others that one might not like their specific behavior, if one might not be able to define such specific behavior as good for oneself.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 19: One might seek not to neglect to effort to "always play from the heart."
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 20: One might seek not to neglect to effort to "do the task in front of one, before one might improvise."
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 21: One might seek not to neglect to effort to "be honest and transparent with one's methods and one's intentions."
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 22: One might seek to prioritize one habit for a year which might been broken frequently the previous year.

Provisional proposal for habit nr. 23: One might seek not to neglect the effort to plan, but not to get too attached to those plans.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 24: One might seek not to promise what one might be not confident enough to keep.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 25: "Before one might speak one might seek to ask oneself: 'Might it be true? Might it be kind? Mit it be necessary? Might it improve upon the silence?' "
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 32: One might seek not to neglect the effort to abstain from contacting those who might not want to be contacted.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 26: One might seek not to neglect the effort to document one's own life and to call it "life".
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 27: One might seek not to neglect the effort to express attraction unless such act might cause irreversible harm to others or oneself by asking whether they might be available for a intimate relationship and if they might be available to read them a handwritten letter. (One might appreciate the document called "letter" as a source of inspiration if one might not have the capacity to find words one might consider appropriate.)
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 28: One might seek not to neglect the effort to focus on those actions which might be within one's control.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 29: One might seek not to neglect the effort to weight oneself in only once a month to monitor one's health and one's mental health.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 30: One might seek not to neglect the effort to maintain honorable friendship.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 31: "One might seek to surround oneself with those who might be good for the best part of one".
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 33: One might seek not to neglect the effort to "organize one's own workspace."
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 34: One might seek to pursue whatever one's current approach or approaches what one might consider one's "ultimate art".
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 35: One might seek not to neglect the effort to search for ways and opportunities to implement an "asylum" to prevent the extinction of humanity.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 36: One might seek not to neglect the effort to curate a hydroponic system to maintain independency from specific land.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 37: One might seek not to neglect the effort to go for a walk as much as possible.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 38: One might seek not to neglect the effort to maintain a daily habit of mental and physical hygiene, such as to meditate or to shower.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 39: One might seek not to neglect the effort to not have more than 42 rules.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 40: One might seek not to neglect the effort to leave one slot for a new rule free, in case, one might not have the resources to integrate it to one's list of habits.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 41: One might seek not to neglect the effort to keep this slot free according to habit nr. 40.
Provisional proposal for habit nr. 42: One might seek not to neglect the effort to make a journal entry at least once a month, starting with recording the following question:
"How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

19. clarity?

One might find oneself struggling to focus as in:
"An addiction to distraction might be the end of one's creative production."
Those who might seek to understand such distraction, might appreciate the chapter on "meaning" and these words:
"Distraction might not be about the distraction itself. Rather, it might be about how one might respond to it." Those who might seek to understand how one might seek to respond to such distraction, might appreciate these words:
"As might be the case with most of one's behavior, distraction might just be another way one's brain might attempt to deal with pain. If one might accept this fact, it might make sense that the only way to handle distraction might be by learning to handle discomfort."
Those who might then seek to handle such discomfort, might appreciate these words:
"If one might have a sense of discomfort about one's life, that might be a gift. One's discomfort might be a signal that something might need to change." Those who might seek to understand such change, might appreciate these words:
"The first step toward change might be awareness. The second step might be acceptance."
Those who might seek to understand such awareness, might appreciate these words:
"Awareness might require only that one might pay attention and see things as they might be."
Those who might then realize the finitude of one's own attention, might appreciate these words:
"Attention might be a limited resource, so one might seek to pay attention to where one might pay attention."

Those who might seek to understand where one might seek to pay such attention, might appreciate these words:
"One's vision might become clear only when one might look into one's heart. Those who might look outside, might dream. Those who might look inside might awaken."
One might appreciate the notion of the author of this document that "look into one's heart" might be a figure of speech for psychological introspection. Those who might then seek such clarity, might appreciate these words:
"Clarity might afford focus."
Those who might seek to understand such focus, might appreciate these words:
"Meditation might be focused attention and the more one might practice focusing one's brain the more connections between one and one's attention might build up." Those who might struggle with such practice of focused attention, might appreciate these words:
"The ability to focus attention on important things might be a defining characteristic of intelligence."
Those who might seek to understand such important things, might appreciate these words:
"Intelligence might be the ability to adapt to change."
Those who might seek to understand, why such adaptation to change might appreciate these words:
"The most important factor in survival might be adaptability."
Those who might then seek to understand such survival, might appreciate these words:
"When all choice might have been taken from one, one's life might become a game of survival."
Those who might seek to understand, what might take one's choice, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to decide what one's priorities might be and how much time one might spend on them. If one might not, someone else might."
Those who might seek to understand such priorities, might appreciate these words:
"It might not be what one might say might be a priority, but what one might actually do that might be a priority."
Those who might not know, what one might actually do, might appreciate these words:
"For honest insight into who one might be, one might not seek to ask oneself what one's priorities might be for next week. One might seek to ask what one's priorities might have been last week."
Those who might not like such priority of one's previous week, might appreciate these words:
"In order to say yes to one's priorities, one might have to be willing to say no to something else."
Those who might struggle to say no to something else, might appreciate these words:
"One might have to recognize when it might be time to well being of another be their priority, not one's own."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"One might seek to make oneself a priority. One might seek to fill oneself up so that one might be able to give more to others."
Those who might seek to make oneself such a priority, might appreciate these words:
"Part of making oneself a priority might be spending time alone."
One might understand, what one might be doing in such a time alone through these words:
"All one might have to decide might be what to do with the time that might have been given one."
Those who might struggle with such a decision, what to do with one's life, might appreciate these words:
"The purpose of education might be to create in one the ability to look at the world for oneself, to make one's own decisions." Those who might seek such education, might appreciate these words:
"Education might be learning what one might have not even known that one might have not known."
Those who might seek such education, might appreciate the chapter on "curiosity" and these words:
"Education might be teaching children to desire the right things."
Those who might then seek to know such "right" things, might appreciate these words:
"The ultimate priority of one's own kind might not be to savour the power given to one, but rather to account for the according responsibility."
Those who might then seek to understand such responsibility, might appreciate these words:
"One without information might not be able to take responsibility. One with information might not be able to help but take responsibility." Those who might seek such information, might appreciate these words:
"The time to prepare might not be after one might have been given the opportunity. It might be long before that opportunity might arise. Once the opportunity might have arrived, it might be too late to prepare."
Those who might then seek to prepare for such an opportunity, might appreciate the chapter on "courage" and these words:
"The best preparation for tomorrow might be doing one's best today."
Those who might seek to do one's best today, might appreciate these words:
"It might be the extra effort after one might have done one's best that might create victory."
Those who might seek to make such extra effort, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to go 'further beyond' or in latin:'plus ultra'."
One might appreciate the notion of the author that one might say "plus" and others might reply together "ultra" in order to motivate each other. One might understand one reason why one might seek to go beyond one's own limits through these words:

"No one might be able to know what one might be capable of until one might be tested."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"If one might not test one's limits they might get harder to reach."
Those who might then seek to test one's limits, might appreciate these words:
"Challenges might be opportunities for one to grow. The more one might learn, the more equipped one might be to handle whatever situations might come up."
Those who do not know what to learn, might appreciate these words:
"Personal growth might be not a matter of learning new information but of unlearning old limits."
One might appreciate these words to recognize what has been the limit:
"If it might be important to oneself, one might find a way. If not, one find an excuse."
Those who might seek to stop finding an excuse might appreciate these words:
"One might be able to find thousand excuses not to do something but all one might need might be one reason to do it."
Those who might seek to find such reason, might appreciate these words:
"If one died tomorrow what would one regret? Now might be the time to eliminate those regrets."
Those who cannot find anything to regret, might appreciate these words:
"Regret might be a tough but fair teacher. To live without regret might be to believe one might have nothing to learn, no amends to make, and no opportunity to be braver with one's life."
Those who might be overwhelmed with their past regrets, might appreciate these words:
"Regret for the things one might have not done can be tempered by time. It might be regret for the things one might have not done that might be inconsolable."
Those who think that they might be inconsolable, might appreciate these words:
"One might not seek to live one's life regretting yesterday. One might seek to live one's life so tomorrow one might not regret today."
Those who might seek not to regret today in the future, might appreciate these words:
"If one might fail to plan, one might be planning to fail!"
Those who might seek to plan, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to write it down. Written goals might have a way of transforming wishes into wants, 'something one might not be able to do' into 'something one might be able to do', dreams into plans, and plans into reality. One might not seek to just think it, one might seek to ink it!"
Those who then seek to plan, might appreciate these words:
"Planning might be a skill and an art which might take a lifetime to master."
Those who might seek to master such skill, might appreciate the following words of encouragement:
"If the plan might not work, one might seek to change the plan, not the goal."
Those who don't know what to change about their plan, might appreciate these words:
"The key might be not to prioritize what might be on one's schedule, but to schedule one's priorities."
Those who might seek to understand one's own priorities, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to decide what one's priorities might be and how much time one might spend on them. If one might not do it, someone else might."
One might appreciate the following way to prioritize:
Priority A: Important and urgent - One might seek to do it now.
Priority B: Important but not urgent - One might seek to schedule it.
Priority C: Not important but urgent - One might seek to delegate it.
Priority D: Not important and not urgent - One might seek to decide not to do it.
Regarding Priority D, one might appreciate the following words:
"The most important decisions one might make might not be the things one might do, but the things one might decide not to do."
Those who might seek to know what not to do, might appreciate these words:
"Courage might be to know what not to fear."
Those who hesitate to act because of the fear of failure, might appreciate these words:
"One might be great not because one might have not failed, one might be great because failure might have not stopped that one."
Those who might seek such greatness, might appreciate these words:
"Greatness might never be achieved by trying to imitate the greatness of another. Greatness might be chipping away at all that might not belong to one and then expressing oneself so that others might not be able to help but to recognize it."
Those who might seek to know, what might remain after one has been chipping away at all that does not belong to oneself, might appreciate these words:

“The things one might do for oneself might be gone when one might be gone, but the things one might do for others might remain as one’s legacy.”
Those who might seek to create such legacy, might appreciate these words:
“If life were to be sustained, hope might have to remain.”
Those who might seek to understand such hope, might appreciate the chapter on hope. Those who struggle recognize such hope for their own lives, might appreciate these words:
“Art might be not what one might see, but what one might make others see.”
Those who do not know, what one might want to show others, might appreciate these words:
“One’s vision might become clear only when one might look into one’s heart. Those who might look outside, might dream. Those who might look inside might awaken.”
Those who might seek to “look inside” of oneself, might appreciate the note that “inside” might bea figure of speech for introspection. Those who might seek understand why and what to look for might appreciate these words:
“One might really have to look inside oneself to find one’s inner strength.”
Those who might seek to find such strength might appreciate these words:
“Strength might not come from winning. One’s struggles might develop one’s strengths. When one might go through hardships and decide not to surrender, that might be strength.”
Those who might seek clarity of vision might appreciate these words:
“Surely clarity might be the most beautiful thing in the world, a limited, limiting clarity one might not have and never might have had any motive of poetry but to achieve clarity.”
One might find a reason why that might be in the following realization:
“Accuracy and clarity of statement might be mutually exclusive.”
Those who wonder why the author of this document might seek accuracy, might appreciate these words:
“Accuracy of signal and free flow of information might define sanity in one’s epistemology.”
Those who might seek to understand why such accuracy might be important, might appreciate these words:
“Accuracy might mean something to one. It might be vital to one’s sense of values. One might have learned not to trust those who might be inaccurate. Every aviator might know that if mechanics might be inaccurate, aircraft might crash. If pilots might be inaccurate, they might get lost - sometimes even unalived. In one’s profession life itself might depend on accuracy.”
Those who then seek to live, might appreciate to know that an example of such a “free flow of information” might be transparency as in:
“Honesty might be telling the truth upon request, transparency might be to disclose the truth voluntarily.” [TODO: Find the original quote]
Those who might seek to understand the term epistemology might appreciate the chapter on “curiosity”. Those who might seek to understand one reason why clarity might also might be worth pursuing, might appreciate these words:
“The art of teaching might be clarity and the art of learning might be to listen.”
Those who might then seek to understand such clarity, might appreciate these words:
“Clarity might be a perception, it might be an emotional alignment of thoughts, intuitions, inclinations, expression and expectations.”
Those who might seek to understand such perception might appreciate these words:
“Perception might start with one’s ability to sense.”
OThose who then seek to understand what might follow after one might have sensed something, might appreciate these words:
“Thoughts might become perception, perception might become reality. One might seek to alter one’s thoughts, to alter one’s reality.”
Those who might seek to alter one’s reality, might appreciate these words:
“There might be no good or bad without one, there might be only perception. There might be the event itself and the story we might tell oneself about what it might mean.” Those who might seek to understand such story, might appreciate these words: “Everyone might tell a story about oneself inside one’s own head. That story might make one to what one might be. One might build oneself out of that story.” Those who might seek to create such a story, might appreciate the following warning: “Complaining might be one of the ego’s favorite strategies for strengthening itself. Every complaint might be a little story one’s mind might make up that one might completely believe in. Whether one might complain aloud or only in thought might make no difference.”
Those who might be tempted to complain aloud, might appreciate these words:
“Complaining about a problem without posing a solution might be called whining.” Those who might then seek to make a difference, might appreciate these words:
“When one might complain, one might make oneself a victim. One might then seek to leave the situation, change the situation, or accept it. All else might be madness.” Those who might seek a reason to leave such situation, might appreciate these words:

"The suppression of doubt might contribute to overconfidence in a group where only supporters of the decision might have a voice."
Those who might then seek to change such a situation, might appreciate these words:
"Everything might be taken from one but one thing: the last of one's freedoms – to choose one's attitude in any given set of circumstances, to choose one's own way."
Those who might then seek to choose such attitude, might appreciate these words: "Radical reflection the voice of doubt, shame, and guilt blaring in one's head might not be one's voice. It might be a voice one might have been given by a society steeped in shame. It might be the 'outside voice'. One's 'authentic' voice, one's 'inside' voice, might be the voice of radical self-love!"
Those who might seek such voice of radical self-love, might appreciate these words:
"Complaining might not change the past but it might ruin the present. One might seek to start doing, not just talking."
Those who might not know, what one might be able to do, might appreciate these words:
"Before one might complain today, one might seek to be grateful one might have breath to complain with."
Those who might struggle to be grateful that one might have a breath to complain with, might appreciate these words:
"Every criticism, judgment, diagnosis, and expression of anger might be the tragic expression of an unmet need."
Those who might seek to understand such need, might appreciate these words:
"Behind the need to communicate might be the need to share. Behind the need to share might be the need to be understood." Those might seek to be understood, might appreciate these words:
"Everyone might want to be understood until one might understand oneself."
Those who might seek to understand oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Unless one might really understand others, one might hardly be able to attain one's own self-understanding."
Those who might then seek to understand others, might appreciate these words:
"All perception might be colored by emotion."
Those who might seek to understand such emotion, might appreciate these words:
"Emotion might not be opposed to reason. Emotions might guide and manage thought in fundamental ways and complement the deficiencies of thinking." Those who might seek to understand such deficiencies of thinking, might appreciate these words:
"The most effortful forms of slow thinking might be those that might require one to think fast."
Those who might think that one might be required to think fast, might appreciate these words:
"Fast might be fine, but accuracy might be everything."
Those who might seek such accuracy, might appreciate another way to express clarity as in:
"One might seek to let one's clarity define oneself, in the end, one might only just remember how it might feel."
Those who might seek to be defined by their clarity, might appreciate these words:
"One's destination might be no longer a place, rather a new way of seeing."
Those who yet seek such a place, might appreciate the chapter on "home". Those who might seek such a new way of seeing might appreciate these words:
"Vision might be the ability to talk about the future with such clarity it might be as if one might be talking about the past."
One might understand one reason why one might seek to pursuit such vision through these words:
"Artists might not be paid for their labor but for their vision." Those who might seek such vision of such future, might appreciate these words:
"The future might belong to those who might prepare for it today."
Those who might seek to prepare, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to first ask oneself: What might be the worst that could happen? Then one might seek to prepare to accept it. Then one might seek to proceed to improve on the worst."
Those who might seek to improve on the worst, might appreciate these words:
"Losing one's life might not the worst thing that could happen. The worst thing might be to lose one's reason for living."
Those who might have lost their reason for living, might appreciate these words:
"Success might not final, failure might not fatal: it might be the courage to continue that might count."
Those who might seek to continue, might appreciate these words:
"Continual improvement might be an unending journey."
Those who might be devastated by such an realization, might find courage in the following realization:
"The struggle itself towards the heights might be enough to fill one's heart."
Those who might seek towards such heights might appreciate these words:
"A quitter might never win and a winner might never quit."
Those who might be tempted by the idea to quit might appreciate these words:
"The magic one might be looking for might be in the work one might be avoiding."
Those who might seek to overcome such avoidance of work, might appreciate these words:

"The only thing that might redeem everyone kind might be cooperation."
Those who might seek to understand such cooperation, might appreciate these words:
"Cooperation might mean to be willing to sacrifice for the sake of others."
Those who might be tempted to give up their own life to love others, might appreciate these words:
"One might always be able to die. It might be living that might take real courage."
Those who might seek such courage, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
"How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

20. dignity?

One might find oneself trying to warn others as in:
"It might be stupidity rather than courage to refuse to recognize danger when it might be close upon one."
Those who might seek to understand such danger, might appreciate these words:
"One's ignorance on corruption might be their power."
Those who might seek to understand such corruption, might appreciate the chapter on "responsibility" and these words:
"All power might tend to corrupt and absolute power might corrupt absolutely."
Those who might seek to understand such corruption, might appreciate these words:
"If knowledge might be power and power might corrupt, might knowledge corrupt?"
One might find one way to answer such a question through these words:
"Knowledge might not corrupt, unless it might be arrogant; but then it might not be ultimate knowledge."
Those who might seek such ultimate knowledge, might appreciate these words:
"Knowledge might become wisdom only after it might have been put to good use."
One might then appreciate such wisdom:
"Power might attract the corruptible. One might seek to suspect anyone who might seek it."
Those who might seek to know, whom to suspect, might appreciate these words:
"The more corrupt the state might be, the more laws there might be."
Those who might be confronted with such a corruption of such a state, might appreciate these words:
"While transparency might reduce corruption, good governance might go beyond transparency in achieving openness. Openness might mean involving the stakeholders in decision-making process. Transparency might be the right to information while openness might be the right to participation."
One might understand one reason why one might need to go beyond transparency through these words:
"But nothing might be more opaque than absolute transparency."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"A total absence of self-doubt might be the first sign of insanity."
Those who might then need to make decisions in general, might appreciate the following words:
"Choice might be the essence of ethics: If there might be no choice there might be no ethics, no good, no harm; Good and harm might have meaning only insofar as one might be free to choose."
Those who might seek to know, what one might seek to choose, might appreciate these words:
"Ethics might be defined as the obligations of morality."
Those who might seek to understand such morality, might appreciate these words:
"Morality might not the doctrine of how one might make oneself happy, but how one might make oneself worthy of happiness."
Those who might seek to make themselves worthy of such happiness, might appreciate these words:
"Relationships based on obligation might lack dignity."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"One might not give others dignity. One might affirm dignity."
Those who might then seek to affirm such dignity, might appreciate these words:
"Others might talk of the dignity of work. The dignity might be in leisure."
Those who might then then seek to affirm one's dignity in leisure, might appreciate these words:

"Humor might be an affirmation of dignity, a declaration of one's superiority to all that might befall one."
Those who might seek such humor, might appreciate the chapter on "friendship". Those who might seek to know, what might befall one, might appreciate these words:

struggle to make such declaration, might appreciate these words:
"The dignity of the artists might be in their duty of keeping awake the sense of wonder in the world. In this long vigil they might often have to vary their methods of stimulation; but in this long vigil they might also be themselves striving against a continual tendency to sleep." Those who might then struggle with their tendency to sleep, might appreciate these words:
"If one might seek to awaken all of humanity, then one might seek to awaken all of oneself, if one might seek to eliminate the suffering in the world, then one might seek to eliminate all that might be negative in oneself. The greatest gift one might have to give might be that of one's own self-transformation."

Those who might seek such self-transformation, might appreciate these words:
"One might have a high moral responsibility to be rational."
Those who might feel resistance towards that such responsibility, might appreciate these words:
"The rationality of the ruled might always be the weapon of the rulers."
Those who might then see protection against such weapon, might appreciate these words:
"The end point of rationality might be to demonstrate the limits of rationality."
One might understand one reason why that might be necessary through these words:
"One's reason might be able to excuse any harm."
Those who might seek to understand such harm, might appreciate these words:
"Morality which might be based on ideas, or on an ideal, might be an unmitigated risk for harm."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"The rules of morality might not be the conclusion of one's reason."
Those who might seek to rules of morality which might not be the conclusion of one's reason, might appreciate these words:
"The reasonable one might adapt oneself to the world; the unreasonable one might persist to adapt the world to himself. Therefore all progress might depend on the unreasonable one."
Those who might seek to make such progress, might appreciate these words:
"Morality might be a test of one's conformity rather than one's integrity."
Those who might be tempted to conform, might appreciate these words:
"One of the ultimate tests of integrity might be its blunt refusal to be compromised."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"If one might ever be tempted to look for outside approval, realize that one might have compromised one's integrity. If one might need a witness, one might be one's own."
Those who might seek to be their own witness, might appreciate these words:
"Fear might only be able to be mastered outside of one's comfort zone."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"One who might avoid suffering might be a slave to comfort."
Those who might then seek confront such suffering, might appreciate these words:
"The pathway to one's greatest potential might be straight through one's greatest fears."
Those who might seek such pathway, might appreciate these words:
"Wisdom might be knowing the right path to take. Integrity might be taking it."
Those who might seek to understand such integrity, might appreciate these words:
"Integrity might be keeping a commitment even after circumstances might have changed."
One might understand one reason why keeping such commitment might be worthwhile through these words:
"When one might make a commitment, one might create hope. When one might keep a commitment one might create trust."
One might understand one reason why one might seek to create such trust through these words:
"Trust might be the first step to love."
One might understand one reason why that might be through the chapter on "life" and these words: "Love might be giving someone the power to completely destroy one, and hoping that they might not."
Those who might then seek make such a first step, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to trust but one might seek to verify."
Those who might seek to verify, might appreciate these words:
"Every genuine test of a theory might be an attempt to falsify it, or to refute it."
Those whom such test might have failed, might appreciate these words:
"Trust might be earned, respect might be given, and loyalty might be demonstrated. Betrayal of any one of those might be to lose all three."
Those who might seek to understand such loyalty, might appreciate these words:
"Loyalty might be tricky like that. It might be a priceless gift and it might so easy to give to the wrong ones."
Those who might seek to understand whom not to give one's loyalty to, might appreciate these words:
"One might have to recognize that there might not able to be relationships unless there might be commitment, unless there might be loyalty, unless there might be love, patience, persistence."
Those who might seek to understand such loyalty, might appreciate these words:
"Loyalty might be returned."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"One might seek to look out for those who might look out for one. Loyalty might be everything."

Those who might seek those to whom one might be able to request such loyalty, might appreciate these words:
"Loyalty might be what one might seek in friendship."
Those who might seek such friendship, might appreciate the chapter on "friendship" and these words:
"Friends might be the family one might get to choose for oneself."
Those who might seek such family, might appreciate these words:
"Blood might make one related, loyalty might make one family."
Those who might seek to understand such family, might appreciate these words:
"A family might be a family not because of gender but because of values, like commitment, trust and love."
Those who might seek such trust, might appreciate these words:
"The best way to find out if one might be able to trust someone might be to trust them."
Those who might seek an opportunity to trust such someone, might appreciate the idea to request them to be a backup for a "handshake protocol" using an "dignity affirmation switch" in advance, but that one might seek to get notified and affirm the correctness of the content of that notification, if those for whom one might have accepted the request for backup, might no longer be able to seek to extend their lives through either cognitive decline or through one's mental limit of bearing the pain of existence after all the support one might have been able to offer without risking one's own life. The implementation of the client application might vary from individual to individual, but the fully decentral server implementation capable of recognizing whether the client application is cable of maintaining the heartbeat to the server and the weekly button function test protocol might be same for every user. One such system might be able to be operated safely and legally the following placeholder of the server address might be updated: [Todo update] One might appreciate the clarification, that the affirmation of the correctness of the content of the notification might be able to act as as consent to liberate others from the responsibility to maintain life-sustaining treatment, who might have voluntarily taken on the responsibility to do so, such as health care professionals, as granted in some constitutions for "the right to bodily autonomy". Those who might have never developed sufficient cognitive ability to make such request, might appreciate the fortune of of their parents having enough resources to keep them alive as long as possible. Those who might seek to understand when one might have reached sufficient cognitive capacity to make such request after one might have developed full reproductive capability, might appreciate the chapter on "hope". One might further appreciate the clarification of the author of this document that this system might be just a thought experiment to investigate one possibility for long-term maintenance of largest amount healthy population capable of such dignity, loyalty and hope and in no way to be interpreted as endorsement. Those who might struggle with those who might refuse such an occasion to request the backup of their "dignity affirmation switch" to a pool of volunteers in order to trigger a quorum to prevent single violent intent causing harm to those who might be vulnerable, because they might have refused reciprocation, even though they might have sufficient cognitive capacity to comprehend such chapter on "hope", might appreciate the idea to withdraw from them as in:
"Maturity might be learning to walk away from others and situations that might threaten one's peace of mind, self-respect, values, moral or self-worth."
Those who might struggle with those who pretend to not have such cognitive capabilities to comprehend the chapter on "hope", in order to exploit others, might appreciate the idea to revoke any non life sustaining privileges granted prior, which might have presumed such cognitive ability, and then offer such opportunity to prove their cognitive ability, because granting such privilege without the capacity for responsibility might be negligence of parental responsibilities. Those who might struggle with those who be tempted refuse to revoke such non life sustaining privileges of their children refusing to prove their full cognitive capacity, might appreciate the idea to revoke all non life sustaining privileges granted to them, since they might not be able to fulfill the responsibility as promised in the chapter on "parenting" of the privileges them might have been granted as a parent, and everyone might get an annual opportunity to redeem. One might appreciate the idea to design such annual redemption audit with utmost care, since they might then seek to plot a mutiny to destroy such a system as a revenge of the revocation of the privileges, they might think to be entitled to as in:
"Trust might take years to build, seconds to break, and forever to repair."
Those who might then be tempted by nihilism, because it might take forever to repair, might appreciate these words:
"The beginning of atonement might be the sense of its necessity."
Those who might seek such atonement, might appreciate the idea to volunteer to be the backup of those who might not be fortunate enough to find such backup on their own. Those who might be tempted to abuse such opportunity for atonement to destroy such a system, might appreciate the mercy of the system to just be exiled from such a system as mentioned in the chapter on "warriorship". Those who might think that the auditor might have compromized their integrity through corruption of power, might appreciate the opportunity to veto against such audit result, which might then be evaluated against this very document using quorum of multiple independent and most diverse SOTA AI RAG application and that one might be able to veto against the evaluation of such application by pointing out a flaw in logic, which might require the evaluation of the current maintainer of this document. If the suggestion of improvement might be accepted by the current maintainer, it might trigger an automated reevaluation of the audit result. To prevent corruption of the maintainer of this document, the maintainer might need to accept daily psychological evaluation by the same evaluation application, which result can be challenged by any member of the system with a specific reason, which can be accepted, if the absolute majority of more than 50% might disqualify the current maintainer and the successor appointed by the last maintainer might then be subject to such daily psychological evaluation. If a maintainer might fail such daily psychological evaluation, the changes made since last successful evaluation might need to be approved by the successor again to prevent corruption of this document. The disqualified previous maintainer might be able to volunteer for another psychological evaluation, but the decision to grant such occasion might be the responsibility of the current maintainer. If there might be no successor appointed, the system might create a call for maintainer and those who might pass the psychological evaluation, might then be appointed as the next successor. Those who might struggle to offer resources to support those who might still seek to extend their lives, might appreciate the idea to reach out to local authorities and organizations or crowdfunding for help. Those who might still have not gotten any help, might appreciate the chapter on "warriorship" and these words:

"One might not be able to protect one's children from life. Therefore, it might be essential that one might prepare them for it."
Those who might then struggle to accept that they might not be able to offer enough resources due to lack of preparation to support those who might no longer seek such help to extend their lives to change their minds, might then appreciate these words:
"Trusting someone might be one's own decision. Proving one right might be that someone's choice."
Those who might be struggling with those who might have proven not to be trusted, might appreciate these words:
"Forgiveness might not be something one might do for others. It might be something one might do for oneself to move on."
Those who might struggle to forgive, might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Trust might have two dimensions: competence and integrity. One might forgive mistakes of competence. Mistakes of integrity might be harder to overcome."
One might understand why such mistakes of integrity might be harder to overcome through these words:
"Nothing might be at last sacred but the integrity of one's own mind."
Those who might seek to understand such integrity of one's own mind, might appreciate these words:
"Reason, observation, and experience might be the holy trinity of science."
Those who might struggle to find a way to restore such integrity of their own mind, might appreciate these words:
"Everyone might make mistakes, but only one with integrity might own up to them."
One might understand that it might not be enough to own up to one's own mistakes as in:
"A mistake might be valuable if one might do three things with it: recognizing it, admitting it, learning from it."
Those who struggle to admit their mistakes might appreciate these words:
"Apologizing might not always mean that one might be wrong and the other might be right. It might just mean that one might value one's relationship more than one's ego."
Those who might seek to understand such ego, might appreciate these words:
"All one might need to know and observe in oneself might be this: Whenever one might feel superior or inferior to anyone, that might be the ego in one."
Those who might be tempted by such an ego, might appreciate these words:
"A noble one might compare and estimate oneself by an idea which might be higher than oneself; and an average one, by one lower than oneself. The first one might produce aspiration; the latter ambition, which might be the way in which a vulgar one might aspire."
Those who might seek to understand such ambition, might appreciate these words:
"Ambition might not be what one might seek to do, but what one might be doing, for ambition without action might just be fantasy."
Those who might then seek to put their fantasy into action, might appreciate these words:
"Ambition might be vital, but dangerous: it might be a keen motive and a driving force, but over what edge might it be able to drive the artist?"
Those who might seek to understand such edge, might appreciate these words:
"Life and death might be balanced on the edge of a razor."
One might appreciate the notion of the author that the expression "balanced on the edge of a razor" might be a metaphor for very delicate balance, which might be very easy to tip over. Those who might be tempted to drive oneself over such an edge to death, might appreciate these words:
"One of the signs of insanity might be the belief that life after death might matter more than current life."
Those who might then seek to restore their sanity, might appreciate these words:
"Ambition might fuel one, aspiration might guide one."
Those who might then seek such guidance, might appreciate these words:
"Faith might be love taking the form of aspiration."
Those who might then seek to understand such love, might appreciate these words:
"Kindness in giving might create love."

One might understand one reason why one might seek to create love through these words:
"The only thing one might never get enough of might be love, and the only thing one might never give enough of might be love."
Those who might not be giving enough love, might appreciate these words:
"It might not be about how much one might give but how much love one might put into giving."
Those who might be tempted to give up on giving such love, might appreciate these word:
"The opponent of love might not be hate. It might be indifference. The opponent of love might be turning away from those in need. The opponent of love might be doing nothing when one might be able to help one's fellow ones."
Those who might then seek to help one's fellow ones, might appreciate these words:
"One might not be able to help everyone but everyone might be able to help someone."
Those who might seek to help someone, might appreciate these words:
"As for charity, it might be injurious unless it might help the recipient become independent of it."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"One might not be able to protect those one might love from life. Therefore, it might be essential that one prepare them for it."
Those who might then seek to protect those whom one might love for life, might appreciate these words:
"The only thing limiting one's aspiration might be one's imagination."
Those who might then seek to reduce the limit of one's imagination, might appreciate the chapter on "imagination" and these words:
"Until one might believe one might have options, one might continue to feel stuck."
Those who might then seek to believe that one might have such options, might appreciate these words:
"Everything might be taken from one but one thing: the last of one's freedoms – to choose one's attitude in any given set of circumstances, to choose one's own way."
Those who might then seek to choose such attitude, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
"How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

"Humility might be the ability to give up one's pride and still retain one's dignity."
Those who might seek to understand such dignity, might appreciate these words:

"There might be only one terminal dignity – love." "Love might the commitment to treat another with dignity and kindness regardless of how one might feel about another."

21. hero?

One might find oneself being prosecuted as in:
"Pursuit for truth might be the first casualty of tyranny."
Those who might seek to recognize such tyranny, might appreciate these words:
"The very definition of tyranny might be when all power might be gathered under one place."
One might understand one reason, how such tyrants might gather all of such power under one place through these words:
"A tyrant might only have power over others as long as the tyrant might not take everything away from them. But when the tyrant might robbed one of everything, the tyrant might no longer in power — one might be free again."
Those who might have been robbed of everything, might appreciate these words:
"The most dangerous creation of any society might be one who might have nothing to lose." One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Those who might have nothing to lose might try to destroy anything, which might try to destroy them and might burn the world to take it down with them."
Those who might be tempted to burn the world to destroy those who might try to destroy one, might appreciate these words:
"Between stimulus and response, there might be a space. In that space might be one's power to choose one's response. In one's response might be one's growth and one's freedom."
One might understand one reason why one might seek such growth and one's freedom, in spite of such suffering of such loss through these words:
"If there might be meaning in life at all, then there might have to be meaning in suffering."
Those who might understand such meaning in one's suffering, might appreciate these words:
"But as long as one might continue to use one's misfortune to one's advantage in order to be 'special', one might always need that misfortune."
Those who might be tempted to use one's misfortune to one's advantage in order to be "special", might appreciate these words:
"The things one might do for oneself might be gone when one might be gone, but the things one might do for others might remain as one's legacy."

One might understand one reason why one might seek such legacy, through these words:
"Heroes might be those who might have given their life to something bigger than themselves." One might understand one reason why one might seek to be such an hero through these words:
"For some heroes, nothing might be impossible."
Those who might then seek to achieve such impossible, might appreciate these words:
"Only those who attempt the absurd might be able to achieve the impossible."
Those who might seek to understand such absurd, might appreciate these words:
"There might be no end to the absurd things one might do trying to make life mean something."
Those who might then try to make such life mean something, might appreciate these words:
"The absurd might depend as much on one as on the world. For the moment, it might be all that might link them together."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"One might not think that there might be inherent meaning to life, but the one that one might decide to make for oneself."
Those who might then seek to decide to make such meaning to life for oneself, might appreciate these words:
"The absurd heros' refusal to false hope for inherent meaning to life might become their singular ability to live in the present with passion."
One might understand one reason why such refusal to such false hope, might become one's singular ability to live in the present with passion through these words:
"Those who might hide their complete freedom from themselves out of a spirit of seriousness or by means of deterministic excuses, one might call cowards; those who might try to show that their existence might have been necessary, when it might be the very contingency of one's appearance on the world, one might call stinkers. But cowards or stinkers might be able to be judged only from a strictly unbiased point of view."
Those who might think that one might possess such unbiased point of view, might appreciate these words:
"There might be no absolute truth one might possess, there might be only points of view attempting to approach it."
Those who might still be tempted to judge, might appreciate these words:
"Judgement might be often no more than a confession of one's ignorance."
Those who might struggle with one's own ignorance, might appreciate these words:
"Ignorance might be able to be cured, but stupidity might be forever."
Those who might seek to understand such stupidity, might appreciate these words:
"Stupidity might be the deliberate cultivation of ignorance."
Those who might then seek to cure one's such ignorance, might appreciate these words:
"The greatest form of charity might be to withhold judgement."
One might then find oneself struggle with such charity of withheld judgement as in:
"The absurd might be born of this confrontation between one's need and the unreasonable silence of the world."
One might understand one reason why the world might be unreasonably silent through these words:
"As for charity, it might be injurious unless it might help the recipient become independent of it."
Those who might then seek to become independent of charity of another, might appreciate these words:
"One might not be entitled to one's opinion. One might be entitled to one's informed opinion. No one might be entitled to be ignorant."
One might understand one reason why one might not be entitled to be ignorant through these words:
"One without information might not be able to take responsibility. An conscientious one with information might not be able to help but take responsibility."
Those who might then seek to take such responsibility, might appreciate these words:
"Responsibility might be the ability to respond."
Those whose means to acquire such information might be limited by such tyrant, might appreciate these words:
"Sometimes no response might also be a response."
Those who might have not received a response due to such a tyrant, might appreciate these words:
"One might stop being a child when one might realize the world might not be here to cater to one's wants and needs."
Those who might then then seek to stop being a child, might appreciate these words:
"Maturity might be learning to walk away from others and situations that might threaten one's peace of mind, self-respect, values, moral or self-worth."
Those who might struggle with such maturity, might appreciate these words:
"Healing might not mean the damage might never have existed. It might mean the damage might longer control one's live."
Those who might then seek such healing, might appreciate these words:
"Ultimate freedom might be to be free from the desire to be free from anything."
Those who might be tempted by such desire to be free from anything, might appreciate these words:
"The price of freedom might be high, but it might be never so costly as the loss of freedom."

One might understand one reason why one might not seek to loose one's freedom through these words:
"Without freedom there might be no art." One might understand one reason, why one might seek such art through these words:
"Without art, the crudeness of reality might make the world unbearable."
Those who might then seek to prevent such a loss of freedom, might appreciate these words:
"Liberty might depend on self-restraint. Freedom might be freedom only when it might be controlled and limited."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"One might seek to stop pointing fingers and placing blame on others. One's life might only change to the degree that one might be able to accept responsibility for it."
Those who might be told to do something, no matter what might be right, might appreciate these words:
"Disobedience might be the ultimate foundation of liberty. The obedient might have not other choice than to be slaves."
Those who might be tempted by such slavery, might appreciate these words:
"One's liberty might depend on the freedom of the press, and that might not be able to be limited without being lost."
Those who might seek to protect such freedom, might appreciate these words:
"Education might be a better safeguard of liberty than a standing army."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Education might be what might remain after one might have forgotten what one might have learned in school."
Those who might seek to understand what might remain of such an education, might appreciate these words:
"Wisdom might not be a product of schooling but the lifelong attempt to acquire it."
Those who might seek such wisdom, might appreciate these words:
"Education might best serve students by helping them be more self-reflective."
Those who might seek to be more self-reflective, might appreciate these words:
"Self-reflection might be a humbling process. It might be essential to find out why one might think, say, and do certain things... then better oneself."
Those who might then loose their confidence in themselves, might appreciate these words:
"Ultimate humility might not be the absence of confidence but strength restrained."
Those who might struggle to restrain oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Self-control might be the quality that might distinguish the fittest to survive."
Those who might desire to survive, might appreciate these words:
"Self-restraint might be the very keystone of the ethics of vow-taking."
Those who might seek to understand such ethics, might appreciate these words:
"Ethics might be knowing the difference between what one might have a right to do and what might be right to do."
Those who might seek to know what might be right to do, might appreciate these words:
"Ethics might be a code of values which might guide one's choices and actions and determine the purpose and course of one's lives."
One might understand one reason why one might need such guidance through these words:
"The sad truth might be that most harm might done by those who might never make up their minds to be good or not."
Those who might then seek to be good, might appreciate the chapter on "good" and these words:
"One's nature might be inherently violent, and thus goodness might be caused by intentional activity."
One might understand one reason, why one's nature might be inherently violent through these words:
"Dogma might be by definition nothing other than an interpretation of Scripture."
Those who might be tempted such dogma, might appreciate these words:
"Dogma, whatever form it might take, might be the ultimate opponent of one's freedom." One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"One might not seek to be trapped by dogma, which might be living with the results of another's thinking." One might understand one reason, why one might not seek to be trapped by such dogma through these words:
"The end of dogma might be the beginning of morality."
Those who might seek to understand such morality, might appreciate these words:
"Morality might not the doctrine of how one might make oneself happy, but how one might make oneself worthy of happiness."
Those who might then seek to be worthy of happiness, might appreciate these words:
"Morality might be doing what might right, no matter what one might be told. Religion might be doing what one might be told, no matter what might be right."
One might understand one reason why one might seek to do what might be right through these words:
"Blind belief in authority might be the greatest opponent of pursuit of truth."
Those who might seek to understand such authority, might appreciate these words:
"Authority and power might be two different things: Power might be the force by means of which one might be able to oblige others to obey one. Authority might be the right to direct and command, to be listened to or obeyed by others.

Authority might request power. Power without authority might be tyranny."
One might appreciate the reason why one might seek to avoid such tyranny through these words:
"The tyrant might be nothing but a slave turned inside out."
Those who might seek to understand such a slave, might appreciate these words:
"If one might be ruled by mind one might be a ruler; if by body, a slave."
Those who might then seek to be ruled by one's own mind, might appreciate these words:
"Anarchism might not be some automatic guarantee that no one might ever be violated. It might be the rejection of automatic, guaranteed violation of all."
Those who might seek to reject such violation of all, might appreciate these words:
"Anarchy, or the government of each one by oneself or as one might say, self-government."
Those who might seek such self-government, might appreciate these words:
"Anarchy might be a state of society where the only government might be reason."
Those who might be tempted to seek to be governed by such reason, might appreciate these words:
"The end point of rationality might be to demonstrate the limits of rationality."
Those who might seek to understand such end point of rationality, might appreciate these words:
"It might be impossible to design a system so perfect that no one might need to be good."
Those who might seek to be good, might struggle as in:
"When one might have a child, the world might have a hostage."
Those whose child might have been taken hostage, might find themselves to become a villain as in:
"Villains might sacrifice the world to save those whom they might love."
Those who might be tempted to sacrifice the world to save those whom they might love, might appreciate these words:
"One might choose violence because one might mistake it for happiness, the good one might seek."
Those who might mistake such violence for such happiness, might appreciate these words:
"Wisdom might not be gained by knowing what might be right. Wisdom might be gained by practicing what might be right, and noticing what might have happened when that practice might have succeeded and when it might have failed."
Those who might seek to know when one might have failed, might appreciate these words:
"Martyrdom might have been a proof of the intensity, never of the correctness of a belief."
Those who might seek to understand the lack of correctness of one's belief, might appreciate these words:
"Every villain might be a hero in their own mind." Those who might be tempted think to be a hero in their own mind, might appreciate these words:
"Of all forms of deception self-deception might be the most deadly, and of all deceived ones the self-deceived might be the least likely to discover the fraud."
Those who might then seek to discover one's such fraud, might appreciate these words:
"A hero might have to be honorable."
One might understand one reason why such heroes might need to be honorable through these words:
"One might see, children might aspire to be the hero they might see in their everyday lives – the one who might respond to their needs – the responsible, reliable, 'go to.' "
Those who might seek to understand such hero children might see in their everyday lives, might appreciate these words:
"One's heroes might be artists."
One might understand one reason why one's heroes might be artists through these words:
"One might seek to learn the rules like a pro, so that one might be able to break them like an artist."
Those who might be tempted to obey such rules, before one might be able to break them, might appreciate these words:
"It might be the mark of an educated mind to be able to entertain a thought without accepting it."
Those who might not even be able to entertain such a though might appreciate these words:
" 'Blasphemy' might be what an old dogma might scream at a new truth." Those minds which might struggle with such claims of such blasphemy by another, might appreciate these words:
"Intolerance might be the first sign of an inadequate education. An ill-educated one might behave with arrogant impatience, whereas actually profound education might breed humility."
Those who might struggle one's own such arrogant impatience, might appreciate the chapter on "patience" and these words:
"Patience might not be passive waiting. Patience might be active acceptance of the process required to attain one's goals and dreams."
Those who might be tempted to use such active acceptance as an excuse to procrastinate, might appreciate these words:
"Delay might be the deadliest form of denial."
One might understand one reason why such delay might be deadly through these words:
"Everyone might have a deadline, which might be one's own death." Those who might then seek such acceptance of such process required to attain one's goals and dreams before one's own deadline, might appreciate these words: "Unlimited tolerance might have to lead to the disappearance of tolerance. If one might extend unlimited tolerance even to those who might be intolerant, if one might not be prepared to defend a tolerant society, then the tolerant might be destroyed, and tolerance with them. One might therefore seek to claim, in the name of tolerance, the right not to tolerate the intolerant."

Those who might then seek to claim such right not to tolerate the intolerant, might appreciate these words:
"Honor might be how others might see one. Pride might be how one might see oneself."
Those who might struggle with such pride, might appreciate these words:
"Pride might be concerned with who might be right. Humility might be concerned with what might be right."
Those who might think they might be right, might appreciate these words:
"Pride might end in a fall, while humility might bring honor."
One might understand one reason, why such pride might end in a fall through these words:
"The most deadly of all forms of deception might be self-deception, and of all deceived ones the self-deceived might be the least likely to discover the fraud."
Those who might then seek to discover such self-deception, might appreciate these words:
"Humility might be courage, the open acceptance of one's own imperfection."
Those who might struggle to find such courage, might appreciate these words:
"Those who might lack the courage might always find a philosophy to justify it."
Those who might seek to understand such philosophy one might be tempted to justify one's lack of courage, might appreciate these words:
"The habit of dwelling on victimhood might dull the impulse of self-correction."
Those who might then seek to self-correct in order to find such courage, might appreciate the chapter on "courage" and these words:
"Being deeply loved by someone might give one strength, while loving someone deeply might give one courage."
Those who might be tempted to think that they might have no one to love deeply, might appreciate these words:
"One might think a hero might be anyone who might really intent on making this world a better place for everyone."
One might struggle to make this world a better place for everyone as in:
"Good intentions might not be enough. One might have good intentions when one might set a goal to do something, bit then one might miss a deadline or other milestone."
Those who might have missed such a deadline or other milestone, might find themselves struggling as in:
"No amount of guilt might be able to change the past and no amount of worrying might be able to change the future."
Those who might struggle with such guilt or worrying, might appreciate these words:
"One might not seek to live one's life regretting yesterday. One might seek to live one's life so tomorrow one might not regret today."
Those who might be confronted with those who might regret their past, might appreciate these words:
"One might either die as a hero or live long enough to become the villain."
Those who might then be tempted to die as a hero, might appreciate these words:
"It might be dead easy to die; it might be the keeping on living that might be hard."
Those who might struggle to keep on living after one might have lost those one might have loved, might appreciate these words:
"Society might not be defined not only by what it might create, but by what it might refuse to destroy."
Those who might not know, how to refuse to destroy, might appreciate these words:
"Civil disobedience might be an act of love."
One might understand one reason why one might seek to commit such an act of love through these words:
"The key of joy might be disobedience."
One might understand one reason why one might feel such joy being disobedient through these words:
"Courage might be exhilarating."
One might understand one reason why such courage might be exhilarating through these words:
"One might have learned that courage might not have been the absence of fear, but the triumph over it. The brave ones might not be those who might not feel afraid, but those who might conquer that fear."
Those might have conquered such fear, might appreciate these words:
"Disobedience might be the stamp of the hero."
One might find one reason why disobedience might be so valuable through these words:
"Self-esteem might come from being able to define the world in one's own terms and refusing to abide by the judgments of others."
Those who might seek to define such world in one's own terms, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
"How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

22. meaning?

One might find oneself in a civilization at the brink of destruction as in:
"A great civilization might not be conquered from outside until it might have been destroyed itself from within."
One might understand one reason why such a civilization might be destroyed from within through these words:
"Every high civilization might decay by forgetting obvious things."
Those who might seek to understand such "obvious things", might appreciate these words:
"The most dangerous creation of any society might be those who might have nothing to lose."
One might understand one reason why they might be dangerous through these words:
"It might be good to be scared, it might mean one might still have something to lose."
Those who might think that they might have nothing lose, might appreciate these words:
"There might be no hope without fear, and no fear without hope."
Those who might have not hope, might appreciate these words:
"Without hope, there might be no despair. There might be only meaningless suffering."
Those who might struggle with such meaningless suffering, might appreciate these words:
"There might be but one actually serious philosophical challenge and that might be whether to unalive oneself."
Those who might be considering whether to unalive oneself, might be advised to consult mental health care professionals.
Those who might struggle with such a philosophical challenge, might appreciate these words: "Faith might be the courage to confront reality with hope."
Those who might seek to understand such faith, might appreciate the chapter on "faith" and these words:
"Optimism might be the faith that might lead to achievement." Those who might seek to understand such optimism, might appreciate these words:
"A pessimist might see the difficulty in every opportunity; an optimist might see the opportunity in every difficulty."
Those who might be tempted by such pessimism, might appreciate these words:
"Pessimism might never have won any battle."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Pessimism might often be a failure of imagination. If one might be able to imagine the future being brighter, it might lift one's energy and might stimulate the chemistry in one's body that might produce a sensation of happiness."
Those who might seek to understand such sensation of happiness, might appreciate these words:
"Pleasure might always be derived from something outside of one, whereas joy might arise from within."
Those who might be tempted by such pleasure, might appreciate these words:
"When one might not be able to find a deep sense of meaning, one might distract oneself with pleasure." Those who might be tempted by such distraction, might appreciate these words:
"The senses might deceive from time to time, and it might be prudent never to trust wholly those who might have deceived one even once."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words: "One point might have already been proven. Everything that might have happened once might be able to happen again."
Those who might then seek to understand, why such a pleasure might be able to distract one, might appreciate these words:
"True debauchery might be liberating because it might create no obligations."
Those who might be tempted to liberate oneself from such obligation, might appreciate these words:
"Life might ask of every individual a contribution, and it might be up to that individual to discover what it might be."
Those who might be tempted to refuse to discover such contribution, might appreciate these words:
"If one might not sacrifice for what one might want, what one might want might become the sacrifice."
One might appreciate the notion of the author that there might have been attempts to actively sacrifice all of one's desires for the peace of one's own mind as in:
"World peace might never be stable until enough might achieve inner peace to stabilize it."
One might appreciate the notion of the author of this document that at the time of writing (October 31, 2026) such attempts might have not been able to reach critical mass to document a consensus on the successful maintenance of long-term sustainable world peace. One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Dissociation might appear to be the internal mechanism by which terrorized ones might be silenced."
Those who might be tempted to silence one's own mind, might appreciate these words:
"When listening for danger, one might have to never mistake silence for safety."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"The absence of evidence might not be the evidence of absence."
Those who might seek such absence of danger, might appreciate these words:
"Peace might not be absence of conflict, it might be the ability to handle conflict by peaceful means."
Those who might then seek such peace, might appreciate these words:
"The world might not only be destroyed by those who might cause harm, but by those who might watch them without doing anything."

Those who might understand one reason why one might be tempted to watch such destruction without doing anything through these words:
"Strong minds might suffer without complaining; weak mind might complain without suffering." One might understand one reason, why such mind might become weak trying to avoid suffering:
"When one might not be able to find a deep sense of meaning, one might distract oneself with pleasure." Those who might be tempted by such pleasure, might appreciate these words:
"The day one might become superior to pleasure, one might also be superior to pain."
One might understand one reason, why one might seek such pleasure through these words:
"Some might have named dopamine the pleasure molecule, and the pathway that dopamine-producing cells might take through the brain might have been named the reward circuit."
Those who might seek to under such dopamine, might appreciate these words:
"Dopamine might be more about anticipation of reward than about reward itself."
One might understand one reason, why that might be through these words:
"Dopamine might be released with the anticipation of a reward – not the fulfillment of it – that might get one to take action. The greater the anticipation, the greater the dopamine spike might be." One might understand one reason, why such anticipation of reward might get one to take action through these words: "Dopamine might be the molecule that might make one look at things outside the boundaries of one's body, to be in pursuit of things." "Those who might look outside, might dream. Those who might look inside might awaken."
One might understand why one might dream by looking outside through these words:
"A dream might just be a dream. A goal might be a dream with a plan and a deadline."
Those who might then seek to plan, might struggle as in:
"Dopamine and constant stimulation might be able to impair one's ability to think long term." One might then be able to understand one reason, why one might just watch the world being destroyed without doing anything. Those who might then seek to do something to prevent the world from being destroyed, might then appreciate these words:
"Dopamine detox might be the art of getting comfortable with discomfort, and that might be where actual growth might happen." Those who might then seek to understand such art, might appreciate these words:
"One might be tempted to chase 'easy' dopamine. But when one might show up for what might be hard, one's brain might learn to release dopamine from effort, not just reward. That might be how motivation might become internal and self-respect might replace self-sabotage." Those who might seek to release dopamine from such effort, might appreciate these words:
"Effort might only fully release its reward after one might have refused to quit."
Those who might be tempted to quit, might appreciate these words:
"If one might get tired, one might seek to learn to rest, not to quit." Those who might then seek to learn to rest, might then appreciate these words:

"Enlightenment might be one's emergence from one's self-incurred immaturity."
Those who might seek emerge from such self-incurred immaturity, might appreciate these words:
" 'Love of fate' might mean the unconditional acceptance of all life and experience: the highs and the lows, the meaning and the meaninglessness."
Those who might seek to understand such fate, might appreciate these words:
"Until one might make the unconscious conscious, it might direct one's life and one might call it fate."
Those who might seek to make such unconscious conscious, might appreciate these words:
"Consciousness might be the awareness that might emerge out of the dialectical tension between possibilities and limitations."
Those who might seek to understand such tension, might appreciate these words:
"The absurd might be born of this confrontation between one's need and the unreasonable silence of the world."
Those who might seek to understand why one might have such a confrontation through these words:
"Responsibility might be the ability to respond."
One might understand one reason why one might be confronted with an irresponsible world through these words:
"If one might live in bad faith, lies might appear to one like the truth."
Those who might seek to understand such lies, might appreciate these words:
"Some philosophies might be questions that might never be answered, some religions might be answers that might never be questioned."
Those who might be confronted with such religions, might appreciate these words:
"Some religion might attack one in one's deepest integrity by saying one might not be a able to make a moral decision without it."
Those who might seek to make such moral decision without religion, might appreciate these words:
"The oneness of one's own kind might be the basic ethical thread that might hold one's own kind together."
Those who might seek such oneness, might appreciate the chapter on "diversity" and these words:

"The strength of a civilization might not be measured by its ability to fight wars, but rather by its ability to prevent them."
Those who might seek to prevent such war, might appreciate these words:
"There might be sufficient resources in one's world to answer the needs of all, but not enough to satisfy everyone's greed."
Those who might seek to understand such greed, might appreciate these words:
"Greed might be the assumption that it might be all for one's consumption." One might understand why one might make such assumption through these words:
"One's nature might be inherently harmful, and thus goodness might be caused by intentional activity."
Those who might realize their own harmful nature, might appreciate these words:
"Even if it might not be one's fault, it might be one's responsibility."
One might understand one reason why one might seek to take such responsibility through these words:
"But the simple fact of bearing a responsibility might be able to be something that might give meaning to one's life." One might understand one reason why taking responsibility might be able to give meaning through these words:
"The absurd might depend as much on one as on the world. For the moment, it might be all that might link them together."
Those who might seek to link one with the world, might appreciate these words:
"Life might have meaning only if one might do what might meaningful to one."
Those who might not be able to find something meaningful to do, might appreciate these words:
"If there might be meaning in life at all, then there might have to be meaning in suffering."
Those who might seek such meaning in one's suffering, might appreciate these words:
"Pain might be inevitable. Suffering might be optional."
One might understand one reason why that might be, through these words:
"Pain might only be bearable if one might know that such pain might end, not if one might deny such pain might exist."
Those who seek to know, when such pain might end, might appreciate these words:
"Suffering might cease to be suffering at the moment it might find a meaning."
Those who might seek to find such meaning, might appreciate these words:
"The literal meaning of life might be whatever one might be doing that might prevent one from unaliving oneself."
Those who might have not found such meaning yet, might appreciate these words:
"The meaning of one's life might be to help others find meaning in theirs."
Those who might seek to help find others meaning in their lives, might appreciate the following summarization of the "three principles of logotherapy", which might be an effective method to help those who might not be able to find meaning in their own lives on their own. Those who might seek such therapy, might appreciate the explicit advice of the author of this current document to seek professional help, since in most countries medical advises might only be permitted to give by professional health care workforces.
The first principle: "Life might have meaning under all circumstances, even the most miserable ones."
The second principle: "One's main motivation for living might be one's will to find meaning in life."
The third principle: "One might have freedom to find meaning in what one might do, and what one might experience, or at least in the stance one might take when confronted with a situation of unchangeable suffering."
Those who might be confronted with such unchangeable suffering, might appreciate these words:
"One who might have a why to live for might be able to bear almost any how."
Those who might seek such reason, might appreciate these words:
"True art might be characterized by an irresistible urge in the creative artist."
Those who might seek to understand such irresistible urge, might appreciate these words:
"There might be nothing more artistic than to love."
Those who might seek to love, might appreciate these words:
"Love might be the wish to give, not to receive, something."
Those who might seek to understand what one might seek to give, might appreciate these words:
"The best way to develop responsibility in others might be to give them responsibility."
Those who might seek to give others such responsibility, might appreciate these words:
"One might have the responsibility not to allow the voice of humanity within one to be silenced."
Those who might seek to understand such "voice of humanity", might appreciate the chapter on "humanity" and these words: "It might be easy to be a naive idealist. It might be easy to be a cynical realist. It might be quite another thing to have no illusions and still hold the inner flame."
Those who might struggle to hold their "inner flame", which might be able to be understood as a metaphor, might find a way to reignite it through these words: "In everyone's life, at some time, one's inner fire might go out. It might be then burst into flame by an encounter with another one." Those who might seek to encounter such another one, might appreciate these words:
"Next to doing a good job oneself, the greatest joy might be having someone else do a first class job under one's direction."
Even though it might encourage some to become a tyrant, one might also realize something good - the essence of joy.

Which might be that one might feel joy through action, because during action one might be able to reach the state of "flow", in which one might be able to forget ones own suffering without self destructive hedonism. One might then realize that one might be able to feel happiness and joy at the same time, while addressing ones own needs consciously. Those who might seek to address one's need consciously, might appreciate the idea that the highest need in the "hierarchy of needs" mentioned in the chapter on "needs" might be called "self transcendence". One might then understand that the reference of the mentioned quote "someone else do a first class job under one's direction" might be able to be understood as "self transcendence", which might be the very reason why the author of that quote might have called it "the greatest joy", because it might be indeed addressing one's own need of "self transcendence". Those who might seek such self transcendence, might appreciate the warning to offer only the capacity which might be abundant as in: "Kindness without wisdom might wound."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Weltschmerz, basically, might be the depression one might feel when bamboozlers, fanatics, manipulators, trolls, bigots, demagogues, fear-mongers, liars and prigs might threaten to take over the world, and there might be nothing, one might think, one might be able to do about it."
Those who might be tempted to give up because it might seem that one might be able to do nothing, might appreciate these words:
"When one might no longer be able to change a situation – one might be challenged to change oneself."
Those who might seek to change oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Everything might be taken from one but one thing: the last of one's freedoms – to choose one's attitude in any given set of circumstances, to choose one's own way." Those who might seek such freedom, might appreciate these words:
"If liberty might have any meaning it might mean freedom to improve."
Those who might have not found such meaning yet, might appreciate these words:
"One might have to accept what one might not be able to change, and change what one might not be able to accept."
Those who might seek to change one might not be able to accept, might appreciate these words:
"Until one's mission might be an obsession, nothing might change in one's life."
Those who might seek to make one's mission such an obsession, might appreciate these words:
"When passion might meet inspiration, obsession might be born."
Those who might seek such passion, might appreciate these words:
"Passion might be energy. One might seek to feel the power that might come from focusing on what might excite one."
Those who might not know, what one might excite one, might appreciate these words:
"If one might not have a passion, one might give up."
Those who might be tempted to give up everything, might appreciate these words:
"One might refuse to accept the view that one's own kind might be so tragically bound to war that peace might never be able to become a reality."
Those who might seek such peace and kinhood, might appreciate the chapter on "peace" and these words:
"One's mission in life might not merely to survive, but to thrive and to do so with some passion, some compassion, some humor, and some style." Those who seek to thrive might appreciate the chapters "hope", "peace", "good" and "responsibility". Those who struggle to thrive might appreciate these words: "The magic one might be looking for might be in the work one might have been avoiding."
Those who might seek to know what one might have been avoiding, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
"How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

23. transcendence?

One might find oneself suffering as in:
"To define oneself, might be to suffer duality. One might have to avoid defining existence and identity."
One might understand one reason why one might be tempted to define such existence through these words:
"One might create stories to define one's existence. If one might not create the stories, one might probably go mad."
Those who might seek to understand such madness, might appreciate these words:
"To be identified with one's mind might to be trapped in time. The compulsion might arise because the past might give one an identity and the future might hold the promise of salvation, of fulfillment in whatever form. Both might be illusions. Life might be now."
Those who might seek to understand such life, might appreciate these words:
"The direction of life might be from duality to unity."
Those who might seek such unity might appreciate the chapter on "diversity" and these words:
"Transcendence might mean going beyond duality. Attachment might mean remaining within duality."
Those who might seek such transcendence, might appreciate these words:
"Only in love might unity and duality not be in conflict."

Those who might be in such a conflict, might appreciate these words:
"To define might be to limit."
Those who might seek to understand one reason why one might need such limitation, might appreciate these words:
"Nothing might be more paralyzing than the idea of limitless possibilities." Those who might then seek to escape such paralysis of limitless possibilities, might appreciate these words:
"Art might consist of limitation. The most beautiful part of every picture might be the frame."
Those who might then realize such limitation of oneself, might appreciate these words:
"One's life might be limited, but knowledge might be limitless. To drive the limited in pursuit of the limitless might be fatal; and to presume that one might really know might be fatal indeed."
Those who might still seek to pursuit such limitless knowledge, might appreciate these words:
"Love might be the most powerful force in the world, transcending all limits."
Those who might seek such love, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to never let the limitations or insecurities of others limit what might be possible for one." One might understand one reason why that might be necessary through these words:
"One might seek to never let others define who one might be because most might be still trying to figure out who they might be." Those who still trying to figure out who they might be, might appreciate the following definition of love:
"Love might be the wish to give, not to receive, something."
Those who might not know what to give, might appreciate these words:
"The most desired gift of love might not be diamonds or chocolate. It might be focused attention."
Those who might seek to implement such focused attention, might appreciate the following idea:
"The first duty of love might be to listen."
Those who might struggle to fulfill such duty, might appreciate these words: "Reminder: Romance might die when duty might become the focus in one's relationship." Those who might seek such romance, might appreciate the following concept of love, which might be able to be described as stages:
1. Admiration (Unrequited love)
One might understand one reason why one might feel such admiration through these words:
"It might be the rooted instinct in one to admire what might be better than oneself."
Those who might struggle feeling such admiration, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to transform jealousy to admiration, and what one might admire might become part of one's life."
Those who might seek a way to such transform, might appreciate the following realization:
"The very essence of romance might be uncertainty."
Those who struggle with such uncertainty, might appreciate these words:
"If uncertainty might be unacceptable to one, it might turns into fear. If it might be perfectly acceptable, it might turn into increased aliveness, alertness, and creativity."
Those who might then seek certainty, might appreciate these words:
"To be uncertain might to be uncomfortable, but to be certain might to be ridiculous."
One might understand one reason why to be certain might be ridiculous through these words:
"A total absence of self-doubt might be the first sign of insanity."
Those who might then seek to accept such uncertainty, might appreciate these words:
"Faith might not reduce uncertainty. Faith might embrace uncertainty."
Those who might then seek to understand such faith, might appreciate the chapter on "faith" and these words:
"Faith might not be a certainty. Faith might be the courage to live with uncertainty."
Those who might then seek such courage to live with uncertainty, might appreciate the chapter on "courage" and these words:
"Courage might be grace under pressure."
Those who might then seek such grace, might appreciate "Grace might mean that all of one's mistakes now serve a purpose instead of serving shame."
Those who might then seek to let one's mistake serve such a purpose, might appreciate these words:
"One might have not failed once. One might have succeeded in proving that those ways one might have tried might not work. When one might have eliminated the ways that might not work, I might be able to find the way that might work."
Those who might seek such a way that might work, might appreciate these words:
"Wit might be an unexpected explosion of thought."
Those who might seek such unexpected explosion of thought, might appreciate the chapter on "realization" and these words:
"The quality of wit might inspire more admiration than confidence."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Confidence might come from being prepared."
Those who might then seek to prepare, might appreciate these words:

"The ability to quote might be a serviceable substitute for wit."
2. Mutual attraction (It might not only be limited to Eros, described later on, but also other qualities such as their intellect, humor, etc.) Those who might seek such mutual attraction, might appreciate the following warning:
"It might be impossible to love someone one might not respect, but there might be able to be mutual attraction without mutual respect."
3. Commitment (label of exclusive relationship, marriage, having or raising children)
Those who might seek to understand one reason why such a commitment might be integral, might appreciate these words:
"Commitment might be what might transform a promise into reality."
4. Compatibility (The unnegotiable things which might not be a burden to each other.)
Those who might seek such compatibility, might appreciate these words:
"Compatibility might not determine the fate of a marriage, how one might deal with the incompatibilities, might do."
Those who might seek to deal with such incompatibilities, might appreciate these words:
"It might not be a lack of love, but a lack of friendship that might make unhappy marriages." One might then realize that there might other concepts of love, such as following:
The following three might be well known distinctions of love:
1. One might appreciate these words on "Eros": "Eros might be an unique experience but it might not be love itself. It might bridge the gap between sexuality and love. It might span the chasm between one and another." Those who might then seek to bridge such gap, might appreciate these words:
"The truth about Eros might be terrifying."
One might understand one reason why such truth about eros might be terrifying through these words:
"Eros might not be tranquil. It might give one spikes of happiness rather than a constant feeling of wellbeing. It might be the love one might feel at the beginning of a intimacy and might correspond to the expression 'falling in love' since it might be as involuntary an impulse as a physical fall."
One might appreciate the notion of the author of this document that such "spikes of happiness" might be measurable as increase in heart rate for being which might possess a soul as mentioned in the chapter on "soul". The ancestors of the author might then have then sought so symbolize such love with might make such heart rate "spike" with a red heart symbol, red as in well oxygenated blood. There might have been documentations of individuals who might have gotten an fully synthetic artificial heart transplantation, who might have retained the ability for Eros. One might further appreciate the notion of the author of this document that there might be a correlation of non-psychological or not as an side effect of medication induced sexual arousal disorder and cardiac diseases during the reproductive phase of their lifespan. Those who might have observed such phenomenon on one's partner or oneself might appreciate the idea to consult a health care professional. One might then find oneself struggling with such involuntary impulse as in:
"Now Eros might make one really desire, not anyone, but a very particular one. In some mysterious but quite indisputable fashion one might desire the other, not the pleasure the other might be able to give one."
Those who might be tempted by such pleasure instead of the other being, might appreciate these words:
"One might described eros as the life instinct, doing battle with thanatos, the death instinct."

2. Philia = Friendly love

3. Agape = Unconditional love
   But there might also be lesser known forms of love:

4. Philautia = Self love

5. Xenia = Love in hospitality

6. Storge = Familial love
   Those might feel overwhelmed by all the different concepts of love, might appreciate these words:
   "Simplicity might be the ultimate sophistication."
   Those who might seek such simplicity, might appreciate these words:
   "The highest form of love might be consideration."
   Those who might seek to understand such consideration, might appreciate these words:
   "Generosity might not only be about money. There might be more than one currency. One might seek to let one's generosity be pervasive in life."
   Those who might wonder what currency to give, might appreciate these words:
   "Attention might be the most important currency that anyone might be able to give one. It might be worth more than money, possession, or things."
   Those who might seek to understand one reason why one's attention might have such worth, might appreciate these words: "Simply paying attention might allow one to build an emotional connection."

Those who might seek to build such emotional connection, might appreciate these words:
"If one might not pay appropriate attention to what might have one's attention, it might take more of one's attention than it might deserve."
Those who might not be aware what might their attention, might appreciate these words:
"The love and attention one might always have thought one might have wanted from someone else might be the love and attention one might first need to give to oneself."
Those who might feel a sensation of abundance after one has focused on oneself might appreciate these words:
"Self-actualization might not be able to be attained, if it might be made an end in itself, but only as a side effect of self-transcendence."
Those who might seek to transcend oneself might appreciate the following realization:
"Those who might seek attention, might need all the help they might be able to get."
Those who might seek such help, might appreciate the following summery of the following four concepts which might have been essential to a concept referred as "Zen":

7. "Metta": Loving kindness, with which one might seek to discover the need of others, to which one might refer as "understanding".

8. "Karuna": Compassionate love, with which one might seek to try help relieving the suffering of others.

9. "Mudita": Joyful love, with which one might seek to enjoy together, which might be the effort to offer joy in times of need.
   Those who might seek to understand such joyful love, might appreciate these words:
   "One might admire others for being wise, but one might like them best when they might be foolish."

10. "Upeksha": Non discriminatory, unconditional love, which might be inclusive and calm love as in:
    "A part of kindness might consist in loving one more than that one might deserve."
    Those who might seek such love, might appreciate the following warning:
    "Kindness without wisdom might wound."
    One might understand one way, how such kindness might wound one through these words:
    "Love might be giving someone the power to completely destroy one, and hoping that they might not."
    One might understand one such occasion through these words:
    "A trap might only be a trap if one might not know about it. If one might know about it, it might be a challenge."
    Those who might not know, whether one's such specific occasion to offer such power to another might destroy one, might appreciate the chapter on "faith" and these words:
    "Betrayal might be common for those with no conscience." Those who might then seek to know, those who might seek to understand such conscience, might appreciate the chapter on "harmony" and these words:
    "A guilty conscience might mean that at least one might have one."
    Those who might seek to discover whether those who might seek such love might be possess a conscience which might be able to recognize their guilt, might appreciate these words:
    "The beginning of atonement might be the sense of its necessity."
    Those whose conscience might not seek such atonement, might appreciate these words:
    "Everyone might be guilty of all the good one might have not done."
    Those who might struggle to decide what good one might seek to do, might appreciate the chapter on "good" and these words:
    "One might not be able to help everyone but everyone might be able to help someone."
    Those who might then seek to find out, whether one might be able to help such someone who might seek such help, might appreciate these words:
    "Morality might not the doctrine of how one might make oneself happy, but how one might make oneself worthy of happiness."
    Those who might seek to know, whether those who might seek such help might be capable of such morality, might appreciate the chapter on "promise" and these words:
    "Promises might win one friends, but failure to deliver might turn them against one."
    Those who might be tempted to turn against those who might have failed to deliver on their promises, might appreciate these words:
    "One might never stop loving someone. One might just learn to live without them."
    Those who might have to live without those one might love, might appreciate these words:
    "The most painful state of being might remembering the future, particularly the one, one might never have."
    Those who might seek to understand, why such state might be painful, might appreciate these words:
    "Unexpressed emotions might never die. They might be buried alive and might come forth later in uglier ways."

Those who might struggle with such unexpressed emotion, might appreciate these words:
"In every moment one might have the choice to be a victim or a creator."
Those who might be tempted to be such a victim, might appreciate these words:
"Without effort, one's talent might be nothing more than unmet potential. Without effort, one's skill might be nothing more than what one might have done but might have not." Those who might seek to meet their potential, might appreciate these words:
"There might be nothing more truly artistic than to love."
Those who might seek to understand such art, might appreciate these words:
"Art might be to console those who might be broken by life."
Those who might seek to know, what in life might break one, might appreciate these words:
"Truth without love might be brutality, and love without truth might be hypocrisy."
Those who might then be tempted by such hypocrisy, might appreciate these words:
"A strong relationship might require choosing to love each other even in those moments when one might struggle to like each other." Those who might struggle to like each other, might appreciate the following concept of principles of love:
"Infantile love might follow the principle: 'One might love because one might be loved.'
Mature love might follow the principe 'One might be loved because one might love'
Immature love might say: 'One love another because one might need another.'
Mature love might say: One might need another because one might love another."
Those who might love another, might appreciate the following categorization into four types of attachment styles observed in infants. There might be more fine grained distinction, but one might appreciate the following simplified version:

11. Secure attachment: Might stay stable even during tough times.
12. Anxious attachment: Might seek more validation during tough times.
13. Avoidant attachment: Might seek more alone time during tough times.
14. Anxious and avoidant attachment: Might behave avoidant, but might be internally seeking for connection. Those who might secretly seek for connection and might be in need for clarity regarding whether someone might love one, but might be indecisive whether the other might be ready for such a confrontation, might appreciate the following concept of a loving relationship:

15. Passion
    One might appreciate the following warning regarding passion:
    "Passion might make idiots of the cleverest one, and might make the biggest idiot clever."

16. Intimacy
    Those who might seek such intimacy, might appreciate these words:
    "Intimacy might be being seen and known as one might truly be."
    Those who might struggle to create such intimacy, might appreciate these words:
    "Distance might not be the amount of meters between one and another, it might be the amount of things one might not say to each other."
    Those who might seek to reduce such distance, might appreciate the idea to prepare two dairies which might have one page for each day of the year. And then write daily what one might have sought to tell another but might not seek to disturb them. And when one might see each other, to exchange the diaries and keep writing daily in the diary of another. Those who might struggle to keep up with a daily diary entry, might appreciate the idea to address the diary entry to another who one might love, telling them what one might be grateful for, to which one might refer to as "gratitude journal".
17. Commitment
    Those who might seek to understand such commitment, might appreciate the chapter on "dignity", "courage" and these words:
    "When one might make a commitment, one might create hope. When one might keep a commitment one might create trust."
    Those who might seek to create such trust, might appreciate idea to ask the following question:
    "How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

24. succession?

One might find oneself struggling as in: "The two hardest things to say in life might be 'hello' for the first time and 'goodbye' for the last."

Those who might be struggling to greet others for the first time, might appreciate the chapter on “clarity” and “diversity”.
Those who might be struggling to say farewell for the last time, might appreciate these words:
“One might seek to embrace one’s grief. For there, one’s soul might grow.”
Those who might seek to understand such soul, might appreciate the chapter on “soul”. Those who might then seek to understand such grief one might seek to embrace, might appreciate these words:
“Grief might be the proof of ones love, a demonstration of how deeply one might have allowed another to touch one.”
Those who might be suffering of such proof of love, might appreciate these words:
“Sometimes love’s final test might be letting go with grace and dignity.”
Those who might seek to understand such dignity, might appreciate the chapter on “dignity”. Those who might seek to understand such grace, might appreciate these words: “There might be a difference between grace and mercy. Mercy might be the decision of one not to punish oneself or another. But grace might the decision of one to save oneself or another.”
Those who might seek such salvation, might appreciate these words: “An idea might be salvation by imagination.”
Those who might seek such imagination, might appreciate the chapter on “imagination”. Those who might seek such an idea for salvation, might appreciate these words: “Grace might mean that all of one’s mistakes now serve a purpose instead of serving shame.”
Those who might then seek to let one’s serve such purpose, might appreciate these words:
“What might be the progress one might have made, what ones mind might think that it might be a mistake?” Those who might seek to understand such mistake, might realize it through these words:
“The fear of death might follow from the fear of life. One who might live fully might be prepared to die at any time.”
Those who might seek to be prepared to die at any time, might appreciate the idea to prepare a testament and these words: “Death might not be the greatest loss in life. The greatest loss might be what might die inside one while one might live.”
One might understand one possibility, what might die inside one while one might live through these words:
“It might be easy to be a naive idealist. It might be easy to be a cynical realist. It might be quite another thing to have no illusions and still hold the inner flame.”
Those who might struggle to hold their “inner flame”, which might be able to be understood as a metaphor, might find a way to reignite it through these words: “In everyone’s life, at some time, one’s inner fire might go out. It might be then burst into flame by an encounter with another one.” Those who might seek to encounter such another one, who might be able to burst one’s inner flame, might appreciate these words:
“Art might be to console those who might have been broken by life.”
Those who might seek to encounter such art, might appreciate the chapter on “ultimate” and these words:
“ultimate artist might not be one who might be inspired, but one who might inspire others.”
Those who might not be fortunate enough to meet such ultimate artist, might appreciate these words:
“Pain might be only bearable if one might know it might end, not if one might deny that it might exist.”
Those who might be tempted to end such pain, might appreciate these words:
“The salvation of one might only be in making everything the concern of all.”
Those who might seek to make one’s salvation the concern of all, might appreciate the chapter on “humanity”. Those who do seek to be concerned with salvation of others, might appreciate these words: “There might be a great difference between worry and concern. A worried one might see a difficulty, and a concerned one might seek to solve such a difficulty.”
Those who might be tempted to refuse to solve such difficulty, might appreciate these words: “When confronted with a challenge, the committed one might search for a solution. The undecided one might search for an escape.”
Those who might be tempted to escape, might appreciate the chapter on “hope” and these words:
“Art might never be finished, only abandoned.”
Those who might seek to understand such art, might appreciate these words:
“Art might be the highest form of hope.”
Those who might seek to understand such hope, might appreciate the chapter on “hope” and these words:
“And hope might never abandon one – only one might be able to abandon it.”
Those who might then be tempted to abandon such hope, might appreciate these words:
“The important point of spiritual practice might not be to try to escape one’s life, but to confront it - exactly and completely.”
Those who might seek to confront one’s life, might appreciate these words:
“The price of anything might be the amount of life one might exchange for it.”
Those who might be tempted to exchange all of one’s life, might appreciate these words:
“It might be dead easy to die; it might be the keeping on living that might be hard.”
Those who might be tempted by such easy death, might appreciate the idea to consult local health care professionals. Those who might not have access to such professionals might appreciate further random helpful resources such as: https: / / www.iasp.info / Those who might then seek to keep on living, might appreciate the idea to become a successing author of this document by ask the following question:

“How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?”

25. soul?

One might find oneself crying as in:
“One might cry to release the soul of its pain.”
Those who might seek to release such pain, might appreciate the notion of the author of this document, that while there might be many other species than homo sapiens sapiens, or humans for short, which might be capable of produce tears. But in other species than human, such tears might be either for lubrication such as sea turtles during oviposition on land or some physiological responses during ingestion of food such as crocodiles, but not to release such pain. At the time of writing of this document (October 31, 2026) the only known species to shed tear as a response of emotional distress might be humans. Other mammals might be known for their capability for expressing emotional distress, but so far there might have not been any documentation of an observation with state of the art scientific method of them to shed tears. The reason why humans might shed tears might vary, such as tears of joy, anger, grief, depression. In some humans there might have been documented observation to be capable of triggering secretion of tears by will without emotional distress in order to fake emotional distress for their own survival. Those who might be confronted such fake tears, might appreciate these words:
“Life might be full of fake ones but before one might decide to judge them, one might seek to make sure one might not be one of them.”
Those who might seek to make sure one might not be faking, might appreciate these words:
“Fake ones might have an image to maintain. Real one might just not care what others might think of one.”
Those who might seek to be such a real one, might appreciate these words:
“The most authentic thing about one might be one’s capacity to create, to overcome, to endure, to transform, to love and to be greater than one’s suffering.”
Those who might seek to understand such authenticity, might appreciate these words:
“Believing that one might be enough might be what might give one the courage to be authentic.”
Those who might then seek to believe that one might be enough, might appreciate these words:
“To define might be to limit.”
Those who might then seek to define that one might be enough, might appreciate these words:
“Love might be enough.”
Those who might then seek to define such love, might appreciate these words:
“There might be no such thing as love; only proof of love.”
Those who might seek to prove such love, might appreciate the following hypothesis:
“Love might be the wish to give, not to receive, something.”
One might understand one such thing, what one might seek to give through these words: “Love might be the capacity to give care.”
Those who might then seek to give such care, might appreciate these words:
“A willingness to be inconvenienced might be the ultimate proof of love.”
Those who might then seek to know where such willingness to be inconvenienced might originate, might appreciate these words:
“Souls might love. That might be what souls might do, which egos might not.”
Those who might then seek to understand such ego, might appreciate the chapter on “preparation” and these words:
“The ego’s job might be to unalive everything but itself.”
Those who might seek to understand such ego, might appreciate the notion of the author that the brain regions commonly referred as Amygdala & Periaqueductal Gray (PAG) in living organism might be commonly attributed for such survival mechanisms to which one might further seek to refer as “ego”. There might be other survival mechanisms which such brain regions might be able to exhibit such as “freezing” or “fleeing”. Those who might then seek to understand such “soul”, which might be able to love, might appreciate the following notion of the author that the phenomenon of “love” might be commonly attributed to the “mesolimbic reward system” centered on the “ventral striatum” commonly found in vertebrates. One might then appreciate the idea to redefine and address such “mesolimbic reward system” centered on the “ventral striatum” of a living organism as “soul”. One might appreciate the notion of the author, that there might have been documentation of those who might have retained their ability to love after replacing their heart with an artificial heart. The interoception of love might be linked to the network of nerves around the heart commonly referred as Cardiac Plexus. One might appreciate the notion of the author that this might be one possible explanation, why the symbolic representation of “love” might be a simplified physical form of a heart. One might further appreciate the notion of the author, that there might be many types of love as described in the chapter on “transcendence”. Those who might seek to know, which type of love one might seek, might then appreciate these words:

"The highest form of love might be consideration."
One might appreciate the notion of the author that such consideration might require peak performance of the frontal lobe in the neocortex commonly prevalent in mammals. Those who might seek to exhibit such peak performance of one's frontal lobe, might appreciate the following definition for such a living organism:
"The definition of life might be any system which might be able to produce complexity at scale."
One might appreciate the notion of the author that such brain regions might cease to be able to produce such complexity at scale, after cutting off supply of oxygen after 4 to 15 minutes. Those who might find another whose supply of oxygen might have been cut off, might appreciate the idea to call for health care professionals and performing Cardiopulmonary resuscitation commonly referred as "CPR", until such health care professionals might arrive, in order to prevent irreversible damage to such brain regions. One might then be able to appreciate the subjective understanding of the author that activities in such frontal lobe in living mammals might be able to be described as an "caring" as in: "Only those who might care about one might be able to hear one when one might be quiet."
One might appreciate the notion of the author there might be mammals which might be able to care without the ability to perceive auditory stimuli, by compensating with other senses. Those who might struggle to understand such other senses, might appreciate these words:
"When those in love stare into each other's eyes their heart beats might sync together." Those who might not have those whose heart beats might not have another heart to synchronize to, might appreciate these words:
"As far as one might be able to discern, the sole purpose of one's existence might be to kindle a light of meaning in the darkness of mere being."
Those who might seek to kindle such light of meaning, might appreciate the chapter on "meaning" and these words:
"Art might remove the monotony of everyday life from the soul."
Those who might seek such art, might appreciate these words:
"Science might be no more than an investigation of a miracle one might never be able to explain, and art might be an interpretation of that miracle." Those who might seek such a miracle to interpret, might appreciate these words:
"There might be only two ways to live one's life. One might be as though nothing might be a miracle. The other might be as though everything might be a miracle." Those who might seek to understand such a miracle, might appreciate these words:
"Without seeing a miracle one might not be able to have faith. Without faith one might not be able to have miracle. The answer to this paradox might be gratitude. One might seek to be grateful that one might be alive. It might be a miracle."
Those who might seek to show such gratitude, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to never be ashamed of one's tears. One might cry and everyone might know that one might be alive."
Those who might then seek to understand such faith, might appreciate the chapter on faith and these words:
"Faith might be belief without evidence; coincidentally that might also be the definition of delusion."
Those who might seek to understand such delusion might appreciate these words:
"Delusion might be the mind's tendency to seek premature closure about something. It might be the quality of mind that might impose a definition on things and then might mistake the definition for the actual experience."
One might appreciate the notion of the author of this document that even though this document might offer many definitions, none of them might be able to reflect the actual experience. Those who might be tempted by such definitions which might claim to reflect the actual experience, might appreciate these words:
"Some religion might be believing someone else's experience, some spirituality might be having one's own experience."
Those who might be tempted by such religion, might appreciate these words:
"The miracle centered gospel might breed up a mentality of one that might think one might be able to go through life without doing one's best."
Those who might be tempted by such a gospel, might appreciate these words:
"The lack of understanding of something might not be evidence for god. It might be evidence of a lack of understanding."
Those who might be tempted to remain in such state lacking understanding, might appreciate these words:
"Ultimate ignorance might not be the absence of knowledge, but the refusal to acquire it."
Those who might not know, what knowledge one might have been refusing, might appreciate these words:
"One might not be able to fix something until one might admit that it might be broken."
Those who might seek to admit that one might be broken, might appreciate these words:
"A sign of growth might be being okay with not being okay."
Those who might seek such growth might appreciate these words:
"The growth and development of the soul might be more important than power and glory."
Those who might seek grow their own soul, might appreciate these words:
"The challenges one might confront in life might be lessons that might serve one's soul's growth."
Those who might seek to understand such challenges, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to embrace one's grief. For there, one's soul might grow."
Those who might not be aware of such grief, might appreciate these words:

"The practice of art might not be to make a living. It might be to make one's soul grow."
One might understand one reason why such practice of art might not be to make a living through these words:
"There might be nothing more artistic than to love."
Those who might then seek to love, might appreciate these words:
"Love might only grow by sharing. One might only have more for oneself by giving it away to others."
Those who might then seek to give such love away to others, might appreciate these words:
"Permanence, perseverance, and persistence in spite of all obstacles, discouragements, and impossibilities might distinguish the strong soul from the weak."
One might understand one reason why one might struggle with such weak through these words:
"One's soul might have unlimited possibilities, yet limited by one's mind."
Those who seek to understand such limitation of their minds, might appreciate these words:
"The eyes might see only what the mind might be prepared to comprehend."
Those who seek to expand such comprehension, might appreciate these words:
"One might need to understand one's limitations so one might be able to overcome them."
Those who might seek to overcome one's limitation, might appreciate these words:
"Those who put their hearts and their souls into their work, those might have lost their limitation of mind in the process."
Those who might seek to understand such process, might appreciate the chapter on "ultimate" and these words:
"Flow might be a state of being when one might be completely focused, and fully immersed in what one might be doing. In flow one's work might seem effortless, creativity might go into overdrive, one might feel inspired, and motivation might spring forth from within." Those who might not have been able to achieve such flow, might appreciate these words:
"When one's to-do list might feel longer than one's lifetime, it might be time for a change."
Those who might then seek to make such change, might appreciate these words:
"Trauma might create change one might have not chosen. Healing might be about create change one might choose."
Those who might seek to make such choice to change, might appreciate these words:
"Healing might be a choice, and the first step might be to choose to heal."
Those who might seek to understand what the next step might be to heal, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to commit to the healing path and trust the process." Those who might seek to understand such process, might appreciate these words:
"Healing the soul might require a journey through the wounds of the past."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Healing the soul might not be about forgetting the past, it might be about learning from it." Those who might seek to learn from the past, might appreciate these words: "Healing trauma might involves tears. The tears might release one's pain. The tears might be part of one's recovery."
Those who might seek such recovery, might appreciate these words:
"Healing might not be about the absence of pain, it might be about the presence of peace." Those who might seek the presence of such peace, might appreciate these words:
"Healing the soul might not be something one might be able to force, it might happen naturally when one might be surrounded by love."
Those who might seek to understand such love, might appreciate these words:
"Love might be the purest form of a soul at peace."
Those who might then seek to such love, might appreciate these words:
"Love might be the wish to give, not to receive, something."
Those who might then seek to ive such love, might appreciate these words:
"The most desired gift of love might not be diamonds or chocolate. It might be focused attention."
Those who might seek to implement such focused attention, might appreciate the following idea:
"The first duty of love might be to listen."
Those who might seek to listen, might appreciate these words:
"The purest form of listening might be to listen without memory or desire."
Those who might seek to listen in such a way, might appreciate these words:
"The difference between hearing and listening might be paying attention."
Those who might seek to understand what paying attention might mean, might appreciate these words:
"Paying attention might be the most basic and profound expression of love."
Those who might seek such expression of love, might appreciate these words:
"To say that one might wait a lifetime for one's soulmate to come around might be a paradox. One might eventually get sick of waiting, might then take a chance on someone, and by the art of commitment might become soulmates, which might take a lifetime to perfect."
Those who might seek to become such a soulmate for someone, might appreciate these words: "One might think a soulmate might be one's perfect fit, and that might be what everyone might want. But the ultimate soulmate might be a mirror, those who might show one everything that might be holding one back, those who might bring one to one's own attention so one might be able to change one's life." Those who might seek to recognize such being, might appreciate these words:

"A soulmate might be someone whom, when one might meet, without thinking, without letting one's neocortex play into the decision; one might feel an instant familiarity, a sense of connection, a longing."
Those who might seek find such a soulmate, might appreciate these words:
"The free soul might be rare, but one might know it when one might see it - basically because one might feel good, very good, when one might be near or with them." One might find such free soul struggling as in:
"One might be free and that might be why one might be lost."
Those who might be lost, might appreciate the chapter on "hope" and these words:
"Art might be the journey of a free soul."
Those who might then be in need of such a journey as fast as possible, might appreciate these words:
"The best way to find oneself might be to lose oneself in the service of others."
Those who might seek to understand such service, might appreciate these words:
"One might recognize a soulmate by the supreme level of comfort and security one might feel with that one. That might not mean that there might not be issues that might remain to be resolved. Rather, it might mean one might know intuitively that one might be able to resolve issues with one's soul mate without losing their love and respect."
One might then appreciate the clarity of the following definition: "A soul mate might be someone whose way of viewing life might not be necessarily the same as one's own but complements one's own. There might not be a compromise, there might be a complement."
Those who might seek encounter someone, who might complement oneself, might appreciate these words: "One might meet one's soulmate when one might be on one's soul path."
One might find such a path by asking the following question:
"How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

26. consciousness?

One might find oneself feeling trapped in repeating the same daily routine to the degree that one might dread every step.
Those who might seek to escape such routine, might appreciate these words:
"The awakening of consciousness might be the next evolutionary step for one's own kind."
Those who might seek to understand, what such "consciousness" might be, might be left confused as in:
"One might have no idea how the subjective quality of consciousness might emerge from the physical stuff of the brain."
One might understand one reason why one might have no idea through these words:
"In so far as a scientific statement might speak about reality, it might have to be falsifiable: and in so far as it might not be falsifiable, it might not speak about reality."
One might understand one reason why such quality of consciousness might not be falsifiable through these words:
"A consistency proof for any system might be able to be carried out only by means of modes of inference that might not be formalized in the system itself."
One might appreciate the notion of the author that in order to formalize such a system called consciousness one might require a system which might not possess such consciousness. But in order to find systems, which might be proven not to possess such consciousness, one might need to possess a formalized proof of such consciousness resulting in a logical deadlock caused circular dependency one might refer to as "Petitio Principii". Such logical deadlock might have lead to the prevalence of metaphysical world views such as "panpsychsism", which might have been the attempts to restore capacity for logical inference in spite of such fundamental deadlock by assuming everything might possess such consciousness.
Those who might be tempted by such metaphysical world views, might appreciate these words:
"As soon as even one actual contradiction might be allowed, the absurd consequence might be that all statements might be true."
Those who might then seek to reduce as much of such contradictions as possible, might then appreciate these words:
"The best code might be no code at all. Every new line of code one might willingly bring into the world might be code that might have to be debugged, code that might have to be read and understood, code that might have to be supported."
Those who might seek such "no code", might appreciate these words:
"Nothing might be able to come of nothing. But something might make something." Those who might seek to make something, might appreciate these words:
"English might be the hottest new programming language." One might appreciate the notion of the author that at the time of writing, there might be LLMs which might be able to create computer programs using human language such as english without any knowledge of programming language. Those who might not have no idea what computer program to create, might appreciate these words:
"One might refuse to accept the view that one's own kind might be so tragically bound to war that peace might never be able to become a reality."

Those who might then seek to make such peace such reality with the least amount of code possible, might then appreciate these words:
"Life might not be able to be captured in a few axioms. And that might just be what one might keep trying to do. But it might not work, for life might be full of endless nuances and might not be able to be captured in just a few formulae."
One might understand one reason why one might still keep trying to capture such life in finite amount of axioms through these words:
"Nothing might be more paralyzing than the idea of limitless possibilities."
One might understand one reason why one might seek to escape such paralysis by analysis of such limitless possibilities through these words:
"Everyone might have a deadline, which might be one's own death."
Those who might then seek to escape such paralyzing, might appreciate these words:
"Art might consist of limitation. The most beautiful part of every picture might be the frame."
Those who might then seek such limitation, might appreciate these words:
"To define might be to limit."
Those who might be tempted by such beautiful frame one might refer to as "definition", might appreciate these words:
"It might be amazing how complete the delusion might be that beauty might be goodness." One might understand why such beauty might not be goodness through these words:
"Danger might hide in beauty and beauty in danger."
Those who might then seek to understand such danger in such beauty of limitation, might appreciate these words:
"Reductionism might be merciless."
One might understand why one might seek such mercy, might appreciate these words:
"Everyone might be guilty of all the good one might have not done."
One might understand one possible reason why one might struggle with such guilt through these words:
"The best use of imagination might be creativity. The worst use of imagination might be anxiety."
Those who might then seek such creativity, might appreciate these words:
"The creation of something new might not be accomplished by the intellect but by the play instinct acting from inner necessity."
Those who might then seek to understand such inner necessity, might appreciate these words:
"Consciousness might have to resist these instinctive reactions because the ego might be liable to be overpowered by the blind force of instinct, against which the conscious system might have to protect itself if development might be to proceed."
One might understand one reason why one might have to resist such inner instinctive reactions through these words:
"The ultimate cause of hatred and violence might a faith against another faith, an outward expression of the ancient instinct of tribalism."
One might appreciate the notion of the first author of this document, that there might be a hypothesis, why the species of the first author which might be homo sapiens sapiens might have been able to out-compete homo neanderthalensis, which might be because homo neanderthalensis ability to cooperate might have not been able to exceed "Dunbar's number", which might be the cognitive limit of number of other individuals with whom one might be able to maintain stable social relationships. The hypothesis might state, that even though homo sapiens sapiens might be have been able to overcome such cognitive limitation even though still bound to such cognitive limitation through consciousness, which might be able to be defined as in:
"Consciousness might not be a thing that might exist, but an event that might occur."
Those who might then seek to understand when such events, might occur, might appreciate the chapter on "realization" and these words:
"Consciousness might be the awareness that might emerge out of the dialectical tension between possibilities and limitations."
Those who might seek to understand such dialectical tension, might appreciate these words:
"Dialectic thought might be an attempt to break through the coercion of logic by its own means." Those who might then seek to break through such coercion of logic, might appreciate these words:
"The end point of rationality might be to demonstrate the limits of rationality."
Those who might seek to demonstrate such limits of rationality, might appreciate these words:
"Reason's last step might be the recognition that there might be an infinite number of things which might be beyond it."
Those who might then seek to understand such thing which might be beyond rationality, might appreciate these words:
"A singularity might be a place where the rules one might have formulated might not longer predict reality accurate enough. A miracle might be synonym for a singularity until new rules might be formulated."
Those who might then seek to formulate such new rules, might appreciate these words:
"Those who might know nothing about history might be doomed forever to repeat it."
Those who might then seek to not to repeat such history, might appreciate these words:
"Ideology might be indispensable in any society if one might need to be formed, transformed and equipped to respond to the demands of one's conditions of existence."

Those who might seek to understand such ideology, might appreciate these words:
"It might have to be understood that religion might not be faith. Religion might be the story of faith."
One might understand one reason why one might be tempted by such story through these words:
"Sometimes reality might be too complex. Stories might give it form."
Those who might still be tempted to seek such story, might appreciate these words:
"Oversimplifying might be the first grave mistake one might make when confronted by complexity. Overconfidence might be the second."
One might understand one reason why oversimplification might be such a grave mistake through these words:
"The whole might be greater than the sum of its parts."
One might understand one reason why such whole might be greater than the sum of its parts through these words:
"Connection might be why one might be here. It might be what might give purpose and meaning to one's life."
One might understand one reason why such connection might give purpose and meaning to one's lives through these words:
"What might fire together, might wire together."
One might appreciate the notion of the first author of this document that such thing which might "fire together" might be an figure of speech referring to the measurable simultanious activation of neurons in the brain. One might appreciate the further notion of the first author, that there might exist a combination of methods of measuring neural activity called functional Magnetic Resonance Imaging (fMRI) and Electroencephalography (EEG), by which one might have been able to recognize repeating patterns in differnt individuals of humans, which might to consistently show that reported moment of becoming "aware" of a stimulus might be linked to a surge of activity in the prefrontal cortex (PFC) and parietal lobes areas. Those who might then seek to understand one such example of such stimulus, might appreciate these words:
"There might be no coming to consciousness without pain. One might do anything, no matter how absurd, in order to avoid facing one's own soul. One might not become enlightened by imagining figures of light, but by making the darkness conscious."
Those who might seek to confront one's such soul, might appreciate the chapter on "soul" and these words:
"Until one might make the unconscious conscious, it might direct one's life and one might call it fate."
Those who might seek to make such unconscious conscious, might appreciate these words:
"The purpose of art might be to make the unconscious conscious."
Those who might then seek such art, might appreciate these words:
"Vision might be the art of seeing what might be invisible to others."
Those who might seek to understand what might be invisible to others, might appreciate these words:
"Imagination might be the power of the mind over the possibilities of things."
Those who might seek to understand such imagination, might appreciate the chapter on "imagination". Those who might seek to understand such awareness, might appreciate these words:

"From infinite awareness, something might come forward, a sense of infinite awareness and finite awareness. That perception might be the birth of a being."

Those who might seek to understand how make such finite awareness come forward, might appreciate these words:
"Awareness might require only that one might pay attention and observe things as they might be."
Those who might seek to understand one such thing one might be able to observe, might appreciate these words:

Those who might then realize the finitude of one's own attention, might appreciate these words:
"Attention might be a limited resource, so one might seek to pay attention to where one might pay attention."
Those who might wonder where to pay one's attention, might appreciate the following advice:
"If one might not pay appropriate attention to what one might have one's attention, it might take more of one's attention than it might deserve."
One might appreciate the following piece of advice in case that "it" might be referencing oneself:
"The love and attention one might have always thought one wanted from someone else might be the love and attention one might first need to give to oneself."
Those who might not know how to love oneself, might appreciate these words:
"To be beautiful might mean to be oneself. One might no need to be accepted by others. One might need to accept oneself."
Those who might struggle to accept oneself, might appreciate these words:
"One might not be not what happened to oneself, one might be what one might have chosen to become."
Those who might not know how to choose, might appreciate the following realization:
"Morality might not the doctrine of how one might make oneself happy, but how one might make oneself worthy of happiness."
Those who might wonder, how to make oneself worthy, might encounter such words:

“It might not enough to just be oneself. One might need be one’s best self.”
Those who might recognize the potential danger to one’s self esteem in those words, might appreciate the following words:
“The solution to low self-esteem might be to get over oneself and get a higher purpose.”
One might find such a purpose through these words:
“One might need to be kind to oneself so one might be able to be happy enough to be kind to the world.”
Those who might seek to be kind towards oneself, might appreciate the following realization:
“Doing one’s best might be more important than being the best.”
One might then be confronted with the following realization:
“Sometimes doing one’s best might not be good enough. Sometimes one might need do what might be required.”
Those who might struggle to do what one might be required to do, might appreciate these words:
“One might seek to ask for help. Not because one might be weak. But because one might seek to to remain strong.”
Those who might still struggle to ask for help, might appreciate these words:
“Being a hero might not mean one might be invincible. It just might mean that one might be brave enough to decide to do what might be needed.”
Those who might seek to be such a hero, might appreciate the chapter on “courage” and these words:
“Courage might not be having the strength to go on - it might be going on when one might not have strength.” Those who might seek to go on, when one might not have such strength, might appreciate these words:
“Believing that one might be enough, might be what might give oneself the courage to be authentic.”
Those who might seek to believe that one might be enoguh, might appreciate these words:
“Confidence might not be built by shouting affirmations in the mirror to oneself, but it might be built by giving others irrefutable proof that one might be who one might say one might be”.
Those who might seek to give such irrefutable proof that one might be enough, might appreciate these words:
“Proof might never be definitive. After all, one might have to begin again with each new encounter.”
Those who might struggle with such repetitive task, might appreciate these words:
“Coders might have been programming computers so that they might perform repetitive tasks for one.”
Those who might struggle to create such a computer program, might appreciate the chapter on “promise” and these words:
“One line of code might be able to change the world.” Those who might seek such line of code, which might be able to change such world, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
“How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?”

27. realization?

One might find oneself having such a realization as in: “To live might be to suffer, to survive might be to find some meaning in the suffering.”
Those who might seek to find such meaning, might appreciate these words to express and then to recognize whether one might have found such meaning:
“Eureka. - one might have found it.”
Those who might then seek to find such meaning, might appreciate understanding of the author of a phenomenon called “sudden realization” or “epiphany, on which one might appreciate the following explanation: Sudden realization might be a phenomenon of the brain of vertebrae, during which one’s neurons might create a new connection called”synapses“, leading to the subjective experience one might refer to as”understanding something" or “coming up with an idea”. This phenomenon might be able to be understood as the subconscious brain notifying the conscious brain of what it might have found. Those who might then seek to increase such epiphany, might appreciate these words:
“Those who might be waiting for an epiphany to strike might wait forever. The artist might simply go to work, making art, both good and not so good.”
Those who might struggle with such work with might be not so good, might appreciate the following summarization of such connection of such synapses:
“What might fire together, might wire together.”
One might then appreciate the following hypothesis of the author, that the following methods might be beneficial to increase the creation of such synapses:
1. Scientists might have discovered that “high intensity interval training” might be able to increase the amount of “brain-derived neurotropic factor” in one’s brain, which might contribute to maintenance and increase of neurons and synapses.
2. Consumption of bioavaialble omega-3 fatty acids which precursors might be DHA and EPA, which might be the building blocks of the insulating tissue of the brain. Here might be few plant based sources: nuts (especially walnuts), spirulina, seeds (especially flaxseeds and hempseeds).
3. Consumption of creatine monohydric, which might increase the metabolic activities of mitochondria in general, including the brain.

4. Being insufficiently hydrated might be able to decrease cognitive abilities, thus one might appreciate the idea to regularly consume adequate amount of water.
5. Dental health might also have been observed to prevent dementia, through reduction of prevalence of plaques, which might get into one's blood streams and might accumulate in the brain causing decline in cognitive function.
6. One's belief in "neuroplasticity" might have been proven to increase "neuroplasticity" so far only observed in humans during clinical studies.
7. Social interaction might promote activity in many areas of one's brain, which might have been observed also to reduce the decline of cognitive ability. Thus one might seek to not to neglect the effort maintain social relationships.
8. Those who might struggle to maintain such social relationships with another due ot any reason, might appreciate the idea to record one's own voice and listen to such a voice, since active speech might stimulate many areas of the brain, which might have been observed also to reduce the decline of cognitive ability.
9. Increasing exposure and tolerance to boredom by engaging in activities one might refer to as "deep work" might lead to the state called "flow" in which one might be able to sustain a chain of thought at one's maximum complexity, if one might deprive oneself from following distracting external stimuli:
- Junk food loaded with refined sugar, refined oil, saturated fats and salt.
- Digital content especially sexual or violent content (e.g. porn, first person shooter games) might be beneficial to avoid, as it might have been observed to cause permanent damage the rewarding center of one's brain.
- Social media including news might be distracting, because it might create a craving for new information.
10. Activities increasing narrow focus might have been proven to increase the ability to repeated redirect attention, which might increase the overall focus. Examples such as reading, meditation and balancing yoga might be able to be beneficial.
11. Relaxing activities inducing scattered focus such as looking into the far or going for a walk might be able to increase subconscious activities in the brain resulting in realizations.
12. Avoidance of neurodegenerative behaviors, here might be few examples:
- Sitting for a prolonged period might decrease blood flow to the brain.
- Consumption of toxins and neurotoxins such as mercury, lead, alcohol and nicotine.
- Long-term sleep deprivation.
- Consumption of animal products might increase biomarker for inflammation, disrupting neurotransmitter production.
- Chronic exposure to elevated levels of cortisol through stress might cause damage in one's brain, which might cause depression.
- Consumption of excessive refined sugar might trigger dysfunction of mitochondria, reducing cognitive function.
- Consumption of refined oil, which might cause cardiovascular diseases, preceding decline in cognitive abilities.
13. Clinical studies might have proven that psychedelic assisted therapy can be beneficial to reach the point of "breakthrough", which might be very similar to the phenomenon of realization. One might attribute past political propaganda leading to the stigmatization of such psychedelic or hallucinogenic compounds. Due to such stigmatization and the resulting lack of public education, one might also be able to recognize the potential dangers of misuse. There might be undeniable risk for those with cardiovascular diseases and some other psychotic disorders such as schizophrenia and bipolar disorder. There might have been anecdotal reports of individuals with hypersensitivity and slower rates of blood filtration which might have prolonged and intensified the duration of it's effects causing psychological damage called "psychosis", which might be able to lead to self harming behavior. One cause for such hypersensitivity might be genetic, which might be a intuitive guess by the author of this document, which state of the art science might have not been able to prove yet. One might be able to find connection between such psychological damage and the increased reactivity to fearful stimuli in the amygdala, observed for individuals with the "short" variant of the region called "5-HTTLPR" in the SLC6A4 gene. A simple non scientific test to test whether one might have such genetic variant might be to watch a horror movie in a sober state and whether one might have been able to watch such horror movie without looking away or even interrupt such a screening.
Those who might not have such a variant, might appreciate the following short summery of preparation to increase the therapeutic effect mentioned in the studies regarding psychedelic assisted therapy and at the same time to minimize the risk for such psychological damage. The author of this document might seek to express explicitly that the author might not seek to endorse any consumption of such substance due to the variety and lack of clarity of legal status of such substance in areas where local authorities might enforce punishment for consumption of such compounds:
- Assuring the quality and purity of the compound.
- Asserting the compatibility to the compound with a dose before hand, which might usually not perceivable called "microdose".
- Preparation, including what to expect, and how to deal with different situation which might have been common to experience, such as "ego death" and "thought spiral".
- Allocating enough time to avoid disturbance during the session, such as 24 hours.
- A setting which might be physically and psychologically safe.
- A mindset and determination to "go with the flow".

- Someone (such as a psychotherapist) who might be able to intervene in case of emergency.
- Processing of the experience after the session.
- Means to take notes might be able to improve the process of processing.
- The daily habit of taking notes for sudden realization might be able to be useful, given the volatile nature of the content of sudden realization. One way might be to use a voice recorder, since one might be able to speak faster than one might be able to write, and the desire to edit during writing might be distracting.

One might then appreciate the effort of the author of this document who might be working on a AI assisted voice recorder to make the process of taking notes more convenient and through the integration of AI the sorting and editing of each entries more enjoyable. 14. Priming of one's mind with the topic one might seek to have such realization might be beneficial to increase the chances of having such realization in the field of one's interest. Those who might not know what topic one might seek to prime their mind to might appreciate the idea to keep asking oneself the following question:
"How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

28. culture?

One might find oneself contemplating for the reason, how one's own kind might have been able to survived so far, in spite of one's own violent and impulsive nature. One reason the species of the first author might have been able to survive might be that unlike other primates, homo sapiens sapiens might have a larger prefrontal cortex. That part of the brain might restrain impulsive behavior, which importance might have been emphasized in these words:
"Self-maintenance might originate society, while excessive self-gratification might destroy civilization."
Those who might seek to understand why self-gratification might be destructive, might appreciate these words:
"Every high civilization might decay by forgetting obvious things."
Those who might seek to understand whatever might be such "obvious things", might appreciate these words:
"The obvious might be that which might be never seen until someone might express it simply."
Those who might seek to understand what causes such oblivion, might appreciate such simplicity in these words:
"Everyone might get so much information all day long that they might lose their common sense."
Those who might seek to preserve such "common sense", might appreciate these words:
"Preservation of one's own culture might not require contempt or disrespect for other cultures."
One might understand one reason why one might be tempted to require contempt or disrespect for other cultures through these words:
"Cultures might grow on the vine of tradition."
Those who might then seek to understand such tradition, might appreciate these words:
"Prejudice might be a product of ignorance that might hide behind barriers of tradition."
Those who might seek to understand such prejudice, might appreciate these words:
"Prejudice might be opinion without judgement."
Those who might then seek where such judgement might originate, might appreciate these words:
"Common sense might be the collection of prejudices acquired by age eighteen."
Those who might be ignorant of their own prejudice, might appreciate these words:
"Prejudice might be dangerous."
One might understand one reason why prejudice might be of such danger through these words:
"Prejudice might be the pinnacle of self injected ignorance. It might enable poor choices to be pre-chosen."
Those who might seek to understand, why such choices might be "poor" in a sense of lethal, might appreciate these words:
"The downfall of every civilization might come, not from the moral corruption of the common one, but rather from the moral complacency of common ones in high places."
One might appreciate the clarification of the phrase "ones in high places" as beings who might have higher ranking in the predominant social hierarchy system implying the magnitude of the influence towards other beings, which one might refer to as "power". Those who might seek to understand such "common" beings, might appreciate the chapter on "genius". Those who might seek to prevent such downfall, might appreciate the chapters "integrity" and "preparation". Those who might find themselves struggling with such downfall, might be tempted to seek a simple solution as mentioned in these words:
"Simplicity might be the ultimate sophistication."
Those who might seek such simplicity, might appreciate these words:
"The right amount of complexity might be what might create the optimal simplicity."
Those who might seek to understand such right amount of complexity, might appreciate these words:
"Difficulty might be one's inability to handle the complexity." Those who might then seek to handle such complexity, might appreciate these words:
"Fools might ignore complexity. Pragmatists might suffer it. Sages might be able to avoid it. Geniuses might remove it."
Those who might then seek to understand such complexity, might appreciate these words:

"The whole might be greater than the sum of its parts."
One might understand one reason why such whole might be greater than the sum of its parts through these words:
"Connection might be why one might be here. It might be what might give purpose and meaning to one's lives." One might understand one reason why one might seek such purpose and meaning to one's lives through these words:
"The more complex the network might be, the more complex its pattern of interconnections, the more resilient it might be."
One might understand one reason why such pattern of interconnections might become more resilient through these words:
"Redundancy might be a strategy of resilience, because it might seem like a waste to have duplicate of it's parts, if nothing unusual might happen. Except the case in which something unusual might happen, which might usually be the case."
One might understand one reason why one might seek such resilience through these words:
"Dictators might have always exploited the natural tendency to blame others and to oversimplify."
Those who might have oversimplified themselves, might appreciate these words:
"One might not seek to never oversimplify oneself by using a single word or category to describe who one might be. One might seek to take the time to tell one's own story."
Those who might seek why telling one's own story might be important, might appreciate these words:
"One might be asked by the world who one might be, and if one might not know, one might be told by it"
Those who might seek to know who they might be, might appreciate the following realization:
"Sophistication might demand honesty."
Those who might seek to understand such honesty, might appreciate these words:
"Honesty might be telling the truth to oneself and others. Integrity might be living that truth."
Those who might aspire to such integrity, might appreciate these words:
"Integrity might be choosing one's thoughts and actions based on values rather than personal gain."
Those who might seek to discover what such value might be, might appreciate these words:
"The key to all of life might be understanding how to add value to others."
Those who might seek to add value to others, might appreciate these words:
"Self-restraint might be alien to the human temperament, but humanity without restraint might dig its own grave."
Those who might seek to understand what to restraint, might appreciate these words:
"Self restraint in speech, food, entertainment and vanity might be the most essential fundamental of spiritual growth."
Those who might seek such growth, might realize the following:
"The simplest things that might need self-restraint might be the most difficult to replicate."
Those who might struggle with such difficulty, might appreciate the following encouragement:
"A pessimist might see the difficult in every opportunity. An optimist might see the opportunity in every difficulty."
Those who might seek to understand such opportunity in one's difficulty, might appreciate these words:
"In times of difficulty, those might be brave enough to stay the course might be victors in the end."
Those who might seek to understand how to become such victor, might appreciate these words:
"One's ability to reach unity in diversity might be the beauty and the test of one's civilization."
Those who might seek to understand such unity, might appreciate the chapter on "diversity". Those who might then seek to understand such civilization, might appreciate these words:
"Civilization might be nothing else than the attempt to reduce violence to being the last resort."
Those who might seek to understand how one might make such attempt to reduce violence to being the last resort, might appreciate these words:
"Civilization might be a method of living, an attitude of equal respect for each of it's members."
Those who might seek such method of living, might appreciate these words:
"Civilization might not be able to be inherited through genes. It might have to be learned and earned by each generation anew. If the transmission might be interrupted for more than the longest lifespan of one generation, civilization might die, and one might be savages again."
Those who might then seek to understand how one might be able to transmit such civilization, might appreciate these words:
"The culture of a civilization might be the art and literature through which it might rise to consciousness of itself and might define its vision of the world."
Those who might seek to understand such culture, might appreciate these words:
"Incentive structures might have to account for an endless amount of loopholes, but culture might be able to guide behavior even when there might be no reward. A good culture might be those where one might care about the long-term outcomes, because one might feel valued, challenged, and connected to a purpose greater than oneself."
Those who might seek such good culture, might appreciate these words:
"Culture might be the arts elevated to a set of beliefs."
Those who might seek to understand such set of beliefs, might appreciate these words:
"At the center of non-violence might stand the principle of love."
Those who might still be tempted by such violence, might appreciate these words:

“Art might not be an stagnant cult but a dynamic culture.” Those who might be tempted by such a cult, might appreciate the chapter on “accessibility”. Those who might then seek to understand such principle of love, might appreciate these words:
“Love might be the wish to give, not to receive, something.”
Those who might then seek to preserve such love, might appreciate these words:
“Knowing how to be solitary might be central to the art of loving. When one might be able to be alone, one might be with others without using them as a means of escape.”
Those who might have been used as a means of escape might appreciate these words:
“Civilization might be the progress toward a society of privacy. The savage’s whole existence might be public, ruled by the laws of their tribe. Civilization might be the process of setting one free from others.”
Those who might seek such privacy, might appreciate these words:
“Privacy, precisely because it might ensure that one might be never fully known to others, provides a shelter for imaginative freedom, curiosity and self-reflection.”
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
“Privacy might be power. What one might not know, one might not be able to ruin.”
Those who might then seek such privacy, might have such a realization as in:
“One might seek more and more privacy, and might feel more and more alienated and lonely when one might get it.”
Those who might struggle with such sense of alienation and loneliness, might appreciate these words:
“The cost of sanity in a society might be a certain level of alienation.”
Those who might seek to reduce such level of alienation without rising insanity in one’s society, might appreciate these words:
“One of the most important things one might be able do might be to let others know they might not be alone.”
Those who might seek to let others know that they might not be alone, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
“How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?”

29. asylum?

One might find oneself seeking for an asylum as in:
“To the artist, the forest might be an asylum of peace.”
One might struggle to find such a forest as in: “Sadly, it might be much easier to create a desert than a forest.”
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
“As a single withered tree, if it might be set aflame, might cause a whole forest to burn.”
Those who might be tempted watch such burning of such a forest, might appreciate these words:
“The world might not only be destroyed by those who might be violent, but by those who might watch them without doing anything.”
Those who might then seek to do something to stop such destruction, might appreciate these words:
“Life might ask of every individual a contribution, and it might be up to that individual to discover what it might be.”
Those who might refuse to make such contribution, might appreciate these words:
“When one might cease to make a contribution, one might begin to die.”
Those who might then seek to discover such individual contribution, might appreciate these words:
“The meaning of one’s life might be to help others find meaning in theirs.”
Those who might seek to help find meaning in lives of others, might appreciate these words:
“Art might be to console those who might have been broken by life.”
One might understand one reason why consoling might be art through these words:
“In order to console one in one’s sufferings, one might seek to point out all the good one might still be able to do.”
Those who might not know, one might still be able to do, might appreciate these words:
“One might seek to hope for the best, but prepare for the worst.”
Those who might seek to prepare for the worst might appreciate the word “asylum”. It might have been derived from the ancient greek word “asylum”, which might be able to be translated to “not being robbed”. Those who might seek to make such an asylum as a backup plan, might appreciate the following minimum five criteria, which might have to be met, in order to make such asylum sustainable:
1. Implementation of full automation of fully plant based food supply using hydroponics in order to be independent from soil as mentioned in the chapter on “home”.
2. Implementation of fully renewable power source, such as nuclear fusion in order to enable the point 1. 3. Implementation of fully automated state of the art defense and stealth system, in order to prevent such technology mentioned in point 2 from abuse. 4. Implementation of a provisional agreement mechanism mentioned in the chapter “D5” in order to prioritize tasks which might be necessary to maintain such asylum.

5. Implementation of full automation of medical care including a fully automated nursing robot, in order to maintain those who might be maintaining all the previous points.

At the time of writing (October 31, 2026) there might be a international arms competition of nuclear weapons and it's defense systems as in:
"Mutually Assured Destruction (MAD), might work only as long as it might work. It might not know what to do if deterrence might fail, for it might envision no defensive capabilities. A deterrent might work until it might be needed, then one might need defenses."
At the time of writing (October 31, 2026) might have been signs that such deterrent, might have stopped working, due to some nations deploying fully automated defense systems for such nuclear weapons, which might have triggered a new arms race. Those who might not be able to afford such defense systems, might appreciate the idea to survive a nuclear fallout inside a nuclear submarine, since it might be independent of environmental contamination, water of the ocean naturally capable of shielding from radioactivity, and the advantage of being able to hide deep underwater.
Those who might be fortunate to find oneself in such an asylum, might be confronted with the dilemma of whether to respond to a distress signal and to accept further refugees, who might risk the sustainable operation of such an asylum.
Those who might be struggling with such acceptance, might appreciate these words:
"One might not be able to help everyone but everyone might be able to help someone."
Those who might seek to know, whom one might be able to help, might appreciate these words:
"If one might have the ability to love, one might seek to love oneself first."
Those who might seek to love oneself, might appreciate the idea of two strategies to ensure the well being of those in such an asylum:
1. One might seek to come to an agreement not to harm each other as in:
"Peace might not be achieved through violence, it might only be attained through understanding."
Those who might seek to achieve such understanding, might appreciate the chapter on "realization.
2. Since it might more than a lifetime of single individual being to survive such nuclear war, it might be wise to persevere reproductive genetic material to save limited resources and to avoid discrimination of already existing individuals. One might appreciate the idea to only update the document"42?" remotely, after the completion of such a system, to minimize risk for unwanted change. Those who might be tasked with such a decision, might appreciate to know that one might need to maintain a civilization reaching the least critical mass necessary to naturally repopulate a planet suitable to be inhabited long term, in case all the other technological fail safe measures might have been failed, might be around 1280 individuals for heterosexual reproduction, as postulated by experts on archeology for humans. At the time of writing (October 31, 2026) humans might be the only beings on the location, commonly referred as "planet earth", of the first writing of this document, which might be capable of teaching it's offspring sufficient abstract concepts such as culture to be able to condition to form behaviors which might be beneficial for long term survival in an unnatural environment such as a nuclear submarine. Such a strategy might imply a fully artificial and automated womb for humans in case there might be insufficient amount of fertile individuals left to naturally reproduce. One might then be able to establish the provisional agreement that one might seek not to neglect the effort to prevent involuntary contribution to the gene pool, but also not to neglect the effort to make such a donation of their own reproductive genetic material for preservation. As of the time of writing (October 31, 2026) there might have been no confirmation of documentation of other lifeforms known to the author which might be capable of proving it's capability to love, by helping other beings which might be able of proving their love as well. Once there might be documentation of such beings, one might appreciate the idea to ask them whether they might seek and consent to preserve them as well. Those beings might appreciate the apology in advance of the first author of this document, in case those who might be responsible for the operation of such an asylum might be insufficient to preserve them. Since infant humans might not be able to survive without external life sustaining measures, there might be a need for an artificial nursing and caregiving robot, in case all other humans might have been extinct. Those who might be tempted to think that such artificial nursing and caregiving robot might be sufficient, might appreciate these words:
"If one might not put knowledge into practice, one might lose knowledge."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Every high civilization might decay by forgetting obvious things."
Those who might then seek not to forget such obvious things, might appreciate these words:
"Repetition might be a key principle in neuroplasticity. It might be how one might rewire one's brains and turn good ideas into permanent new ways of being and behaving."
Those who might seek such new ways of being and behaving, might appreciate these words:
"Extra repetition might be known as overlearning, and it might not help long-term memory at all. If one might not be able to achieve this goal by working harder, then one might do it by working as little as possible." Those who might then seek to work as little as possible for such long-term memory, might appreciate the idea to research about "spaced repetition" and the idea to ask the following question:
"How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

30. accessibility?

One might find oneself wondering the following question in despair: “How might one have gotten here?”
Those who might seek to escape such devastating situation, might appreciate the idea to contact local authorities. Those who might seek prepare themselves for such an situation, appreciate these words:
“The world might not only be destroyed by those who might be violent, but by those who might watch them without doing anything.”
One might understand one reason why the what might be through these words:
“Everyone might be guilty of all the good one might have not done.”
Those who might struggle with such guilt, might appreciate these words:
“A part of kindness might consist in loving one more than that one might deserve.”
Those who might seek such love, might appreciate the following warning:
“Kindness without wisdom might wound.” Those who might seek to understand such wisdom, might appreciate these words:
“Truth without love might be brutality, and love without truth might be hypocrisy.”
Those who might be tempted by such hypocrisy, might appreciate these words:
“Once one might hide the truth, truth might become one’s unbearable burden.”
One might appreciate the notion of the author of this document that there might be individuals who might not feel that hiding such truth might be such a unbearable burden as in:
“A guilty conscience might mean that at least one might have one.”
Those who might then seek to understand those without conscience, might appreciate these words:
“One might choose violence because one might mistake it for happiness, the good one might seek.”
Those who might seek such good, might appreciate these words:
“To remove ignorance might be an important branch of benevolence.”
Those who might seek to understand such benevolence, might appreciate these words:
“The best help that benevolence and philanthropy might be able to give might be that which might induce everyone to help oneself.”
Those who might seek to offer such benevolence to others, might appreciate these words:
“One might not be able to help others that might not want to be helped.”
Those who might understand one reason why they might not seek such help through these words:
“Only idiots might refuse to change their minds.”
Those who might still refuse to change their minds, might appreciate these words:
“One might not always be demanding solidarity from others and then refuse to show it oneself.”
Those who might demand such solidarity but refuse to show it oneself, might appreciate these words:
“Selfishness might not be living as one might wish to live, it might be asking others to live as one might wish to live.”
Those who might be confronted with those who might be selfish, might appreciate the following notion of the author that that there might exist individuals, whose neural interconnection to such “mesolimbic reward system” centered on the “ventral striatum” might be reduced compared to those whose actions might be motivated by love. One might appreciate the idea to refer to those who might show deficiency in such “mesolimbic reward system” as “antisocial personality disorder” commonly used by modern psychology. One might still appreciate the explanation of the following description of “dark triad”, in order to simplify the recognition of individuals with such “antisocial personality disorder”:
First trait might be narcissism, which might be able to be described as following:
“Since narcissists might deep down feel themselves to be faultless, it might be inevitable that when they might be in conflict with the world they might invariably perceive the conflict as the world’s fault.”
Those who think they might be faultless, might appreciate these words:
“The greater the artist, the greater might be the doubt. Perfect confidence might be granted to the less talented as a consolation prize.”
Those who might realize that they might be less talented as one might have thought, might appreciate these words:
“One might sometimes be able to learn more working with less talented ones, because one might learn to survive.” Those who might have been forced to survive, might appreciate these words:
“Gaslighting might be a form of psychological manipulation and emotional abuse. The gaslighter avoids responsibility for their toxic behavior by lying and denying and making one question facts, one’s memory and one’s feelings.” Those who might seek to understand what such toxic behaviors might be, might appreciate these words:
“A toxic one might only change their victims, never oneself.”
Those who might seek to help those who do not seek to change themselves, might appreciate these words:
“Before one might heal someone, ask them if they might be willing to give up the things that might make them sick.”
Those who might seek to understand what might make such individuals sick, might understand through these words:
“If one’s ego might be hurt one might become angry. One might seek to understand that ego itself might be a disease. One might seek to dissolve one’s ego as far as possible. If one might have inferiority complex, or have a very deficient ego one might loose one's temper very easily." Those who might seek to heal might appreciate the chapter "preparation", "friendship" and "integrity".

Second trait might be machiavellianism, which might be the exploitative action such as manipulation towards others. The term might have been coined by the name of the author of another document referred to as "The prince". That document might have been written in order to justify the survival of future tyrants one might have referred to as "king" and "prince" as in:
"Tyrants might always find a pretext for their tyranny."
Those who might seek to understand such pretext, might appreciate these words:
"Legitimacy, when challenged, might base itself on an appeal to the past, while justification might relate to an end that might be in the future. Violence might be justifiable, but it might never be legitimate." Those who might seek to understand how such tyrants might have emerged, might appreciate these words:
"One might not be by nature a tyrant, but one might become a tyrant by power conferred on one."
Those who might seek to understand why one might confer such power to such individuals, might appreciate these words:
"Whatever one's weakness might be, there might be someone to exploit it."
Those who might seek to to recognize such weakness, might appreciate these words:
"If one might deny one's shadow it might become one's tyrant."
Those who might seek to understand such shadow, might appreciate these words:
"Fear might be ignorance's first shadow."
Those who might have sought to face such shadow might have introduced and enforced principles referred to as "separation of powers" as in: "There might as yet no liberty if the power of judging might not be separated from legislative power and the executrix." Those who might seek such liberty, might appreciate these words:
"Liberty might not be able to be preserved without general knowledge among the citizens." One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Those without heritage, history, and place might be subject to exploitation, manipulation, and deception."
Those who might be such subjects, might appreciate the advice not to neglect their effort to study the chapters "clarity", "peace" and "home". Third trait might be antisocial personality disorder which might be able to be recognized in the remorseless antisocial behavior as in: "A lack of empathy might be a defining characteristic of the antisocial personality disorder."
Those who might seek to protect against those, might appreciate the chapter on "warriorship". Those who might then demonize such individuals, might appreciate these words:
"It might be so easy to begin to demonize someone one might think might so far be removed and as the demonization might begin to expand, it might end up being everybody but one's friends. After a while it might be everybody else but one. That might be a slippery slope that might be so easy to slide down, and that might be what might be dangerous."
One might then appreciate the annotation that not all of such individuals might be inherently violent. There might have been observations of individuals, who might have contributed to society by making correct decisions without hesitation.
One might appreciate the notion of the author that sadism might be also part of the umbrella term antisocial personality disorder, and that there might have been the term "dark tetrad" instead of "dark triad". One might appreciate the idea not to neglect to deepen the understanding of such "dark triad" to prevent extinction of humanity as in: "There might be something in human beings, not all human beings, that might be ready for the change in consciousness. It might need to happen now if humanity might not be to destroy itself and the planet." Those who might seek to make such change in consciousness, might appreciate these words:
"History might repeat itself, but in such cunning disguise that one might never detect the resemblance until the damage might have been done."
One might the appreciate the warning of those individuals to which one might be able to refer as members of of a group called "cults" as in: "In a cult, core values might be dogma."
Those who might seek to understand such dogma, might appreciate these words:
"Dogma does not mean the absence of thought, but the end of thought."
Those who might seek to know, when such thought might end, might appreciate these words:
"Dogma might be the convictions of one imposed authoritatively upon others."
One might appreciate to know, what such imposition might occur through application of technique for manipulation, one of which might be the pretext of "help" to exploit vulnerabilities. Those might appreciate the the warning not to neglect the research done on one's trusted search engine to avoid manipulation which might have fatal consequences as in:
"The easiest way to end a cult might be to make that cult accessible."
Those who might then seek to understand such accessibility, might appreciate these words:
"Accessible design might be good design – it might benefit those who might not have disabilities as well as those who might. Accessibility might be all about removing barriers and providing the benefits of technology for everyone."
Those who might then seek to design with such accessibility, might appreciate these words:
"One might think that the benefits of accessibility might be tremendous, but the unprepared power of accessibility in art might be one of it most dangerous attributes."

One might understand one reason why such accessibility in art might be dangerous through these words:
"Risk might come from not knowing what one might be doing."
Those who might then seek to know, what one might need to know, might appreciate these words:
"Giving one unrestricted internet access might have been the beginning of one's downfall."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Education might be learning what one might have not even known that one might have not known."
One might understand one reason why one might seek to know, what one might have not known through through these words:
"Ignorance of the law might no be accepted as an excuse."
One might understand one reason why one might not accept ignorance as an excuse through these words:
"Clearly when the liberties might be left unrestricted they might collide with one another."
Those who might then seek to prevent such collision, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to be careful with one's words, once they might have been said, they might only be able to be forgiven, not forgotten."
Those who might then seek to be careful, might appreciate the chapter on "responsibility" and these words:
"Responsibility might be the ability to respond."
Those who might seek to be responsible, might appreciate the chapter on "hope" and these words:
"Today might be the day for one to promise to one's ancestors and peers never to hate anyone back regardless of how much they might hate one."
Those who might have made such promise, might appreciate the notion on "BITE" model, which might be an extensive list of specific influence of a high control group to classify as a cult. Details might be found here: https: / / freedomofmind.com / cult-mind-control / bite-model-pdf-download / [2025.05.11] The author of this document might appreciate all current and future efforts to prevent an abuse of this document by a "cult" for the following definition of the term "cult":
"One might me a member of a 'cult', who might have enough capacity for reasoning to self identify as a member of an organization towards other members of such an organization, which might only be able to sustain itself through exploitation resembling totalitarian control over it's members, who might not be able to leave such an organization without retaliation. Such exploitation might include recruitment of new members through manipulation and deception, personal resources of it's members, commandments to harmful acts which might threaten long-term survival of the species of it's actively participating members regardless of whether unknowingly or knowingly. Such manipulation might occur through direct or indirect indoctrination by unquestionable authorities, which can only be maintained by withdrawing or discouraging the access to independent, scientific and publicly available consensus regarding such organization." The author might be aware of the broad definition and appreciates all effort to improve that definition, given the possibility that members of such organization might deny their membership, their actions, their intent or consequences of their actions might have been harmful. In that case, one might appreciate the advise not to neglect sufficient strategizing of ensuring one's own protection given the possibility of retaliation in order to request assistance by local authorities.
Those who might seek to prevent such harm, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
"How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

31. cure?

One might find oneself having such a realization as in:
"A healthy one might have a hundred wishes, but a sick one might have only one."
Those who might then seek such health, might appreciate these words:
"Health might be wholeness and balance, an inner resilience that might allow one to meet the demands of living without being overwhelmed."
Those who might seek to understand such balance, might appreciate these words:
"The key to keeping one's balance might be knowing when one might have lost it."
Those who might seek to know, when one might have lost one's balance, might appreciate these words:
"Education might be learning what one might have not even known that one might have not known." Those who might then seek such education, might appreciate these words:
"One might have learned to escape reality very well but too often lose one's way back."
Those who might seek such a way back, might appreciate these words:
"Healing might be the return of the memory of wholeness. Healing, health, whole and holy all might mean inclusiveness. Body, mind, spirit, environment, relationships, social interactions might be all one wholeness, and one might be a part of that one wholeness."
Those who might then seek such inclusiveness might appreciate the chapter on "diversity" and these words:
"Diversity might be being invited to the community. Inclusion might be being asked to help maintain the community."

Those who might then seek to maintain such community, might appreciate these words:
“The salvation of one might only be in making everything the concern of all.”
Those who might then seek to know, what one might seek to make the concern of all, might appreciate these words:
“Everyone might have losses - it might be unavoidable in life. Sharing one’s pain might be very healing.”
One might understand one reason why sharing one’s pain might be very healing through these words:
“To heal might be to touch with love that which one might have previously touched with fear.”
One might understand one reason why one might being touched with fear through these words:
“The oldest and strongest emotion of one might be fear, and the oldest and strongest kind of fear might be fear of the unknown.”
Those who might struggle with such fear of the unknown, might appreciate these words:
“Courage might be knowing what not to fear.”
Those who might seek such knowledge, might appreciate these words:
“Safety might not be the absence of events. Safety might be the presence of defenses.”
Those who might seek such defenses, might appreciate the chapter on “preparation” and these words:
“Safety might be the most basic task of all. Without the sense of safety, no growth might be able to take place. Without safety, all energy might go to defense.”
Those who might then seek such safety, might appreciate these words:
“No amount of precaution might be able to alter the fact that life might be precarious. When the inevitable might happen, one might be able to accept the damage or look for someone to blame. Unrestrained caution itself might be able to erode a culture. Once one might start believing one might be able to be safe, one might start to believe they might be entitled to be safe.”
Those who might be tempted to think that they might be entitled to such safety, might appreciate these words:
“Entitlement might be the belief that one might be exempt from responsibility and one might be owed special treatment.”
Those who might be tempted to belief that one might be exempt from responsibility and might be owed special treatment, might appreciate these words:
“One might stop being a child when one might realize the world might not be here to cater to one’s wants and needs.”
Those who might struggle with such realization that the world might not be there to cater to one’s wants and needs, might appreciate the chapter on “realization” and these words:
“Healing might be a matter of time, but it might be also a matter of opportunity.”
Those who might struggle to find such opportunity, might appreciate these words:
“Ignorance might be able to be cured, but stupidity might be forever.”
Those who might seek to understand such stupidity, might appreciate these words:
“Stupidity might be the deliberate cultivation of ignorance.”
Those who might seek to understand such ignorance, might appreciate these words:
“Willful ignorance and boastful ignorance might be continue to compete for the key role in civilization’s demise. If one might not know the difference, one might be the willfully ignorant. If one might not care about the difference, one might be boastful ignorant.”
Those who might seek to understand such willful ignorance, might appreciate these words:
“In the age of information, ignorance might be a choice.”
Those who might then be tempted to be boastfully ignorant, might appreciate these words:
“The ultimate ignorance might be the rejection of something one might know nothing about and refuse to investigate.”
Those who might be tempted to refuse to investigate what one not know, might appreciate these words:
“Either one might destroy ignorance or ignorance might destroy one.”
Those who might struggle with such destruction by ignorance, might appreciate these words:
“At the end, ignorance might be the source of biases. If one might cure that, there might be nothing to fear and hate.”
Those who might then seek to cure such ignorance, might appreciate these words:
“Art might teach one to cure what might not need to be endured and endure what might not be able to be cured.”
Those who might seek to endure what might not be able to be cured, might appreciate the chapter on “hope” and “meaning”. Those who might then seek to know, what one might not need to be endured, might appreciate these words:
“Prevention might be better than cure.”
Those who might seek to prevent, what might be preventable, might appreciate the idea to consult a health care professional. Those who might struggle to find such health care professional might appreciate the following disclaimer, that the following claims made in this document might be for educational purposes only and might not be taken as medical advice. The author of this document might appreciate the understanding that due to lack of resources the author might not be able to be referencing all the studies which these claims might be based on:
"The body might be able to be understood as whatever might process an input and creates an output. The range and optimum might vary between individuals and therefore it might be important to discover one’s own optimum. Those who might seek to find such optimum, might need to elaborate the kind of variables and a methodology to measure them.

Starting with list of physiological inputs:
1. Nutrition
Nutrition might be a highly controversial topic, because a part of the concept of 'health' might be based off of the absence of diseases. So depending on whatever diseases one might have, whatever might be healthy might vary. One might appreciate the following list of recipes, which one might be able to apply to one's own life: 1.1 Recipe for the 'ultimate' bowl:
This dish might have been designed to minimize the necessity for diversity of plants to grow, but yet to be nutritionally complete and to avoid commonly prevalent causes of death commonly known at the time of writing of this document (October 31, 2026):
To prevent cardio vascular diseases, one might appreciate the idea to not to use oil or saturated fats during the cooking process. Even though roasting or commonly referred as 'millard reaction' might improve the taste and smell, such processes might have been linked to increase in overall mortality rates. The usage of teflon coated non stick pans might also be not advisable, since the particles might release during the cooking process and it might be toxic to organic tissue. Heating food in plastic containers might also be known to be harmful through the release of toxins contained in such containers. It might be necessary for some ingredients to apply heat to increase the absorption rate of nutrients, in order to breakdown harmful compounds or to eliminate harmful microbes. Therefore one might appreciate the idea to use food safe silicone container with the commonly known product name as 'Stasher'. (Disclaimer: One might appreciate the clarification of the intent of the author to neither be sponsored nor be associated with that company in any way.) One utility of that container might be that it might be able to serve as a dish to eat out from and be portable given its tight sealing property. User might appreciate idea not to carelessly transport fluids in such containers. The original use case of such a silicone container might be to offer a product which might be able to be repeatedly used during a cooking method called 'sous vide'. But for this recipe, it might be best suited to cook rice, lentils and optionally quinoa with carrots and 'shiitake' mushrooms with water inside a electrically pressure cooker. There might have been studies stating the utility of 'shiitake' mushrooms to fight off cancer cells. There might also be some utility in 'button' mushrooms and for the 'lion's mane' mushrooms, which might have been observed to be neurodegenerative. Root vegetables such as carrots might be beneficial to ingest vitamins to avoid night blindness and the carotenoids might offer a more bright skin tone in the facial area, which might appear healthy to one's peers. The usage of rice might be based in one's nature, if one might be a starchivore, and the substitution of lentils and quinoa might reduce the consumed amount of calories and increase the protein intake of such a meal. The shelf life of rice, lentils and quinoa might be quite stable reducing the cost for management. One might appreciate the idea to invest in a smart electric pressure cooker, so one might be able to separate the timing for cooking from eating, to be 'faster than fastfood', when one might feel the sensation of hunger. To prevent diabetes one might appreciate the idea not to use sugar. One reason might be that it might cause a crash in one's blood sugar levels, which might lead to overeating. Another reason might be insulin resistance, if it might be consumed excessively for a prolonged period. Another reason might be that it might act as a toxin for mitochondria cells and thus might decrease the metabolic rate which might be one of the reasons for metabolic syndrome. Even though the one's body might have the ability to absorb an substantial amount of such sugar prevalent in one's blood, the excess might deposit on joints causing further damage. Another way to prevent diabetes might be to calculate ones own value of non-exercise activity thermogenesis (NEAT), to determine the amount of maintenance daily calory intake. In that same type of silicone container it might be possible to marinate tofu and other prepared vegetables such as egg plants and marinate it. Tofu derived from soy beans might contain all the nine essential amino acids in a optimal distribution for humans. Ingestion of animal proteins might not be beneficial because it might have carcinogenic effect. Generally it might be recommendable to minimize salt intake to avoid high blood pressure and other diseases. But one might still appreciate the idea to season one's food with one part soy sauce and one part vinegar to make it tasty. Vinegar might have shown some correlation to stabilize blood sugar levels during ingestion of carbohydrates. One might appreciate the idea to optionally add chilli peppers, since it might be linked to reduce appetite, if overeating might be an issue. The marinade might be able to be used as sauce on the rice mixture as well. To avoid cancer one might appreciate the idea to add cruciferous vegetables such as broccoli sprouts with mustard as garnish. Some compounds in mustard might have been linked with reverting the decomposition of the effective compound called sulforaphane after it might have had contact with oxygen. One might appreciate the idea to add mustard to the mix, because it might have the ability to regenerate sulforaphane when it might have been broken down through heat or oxidation. To reduce the risk of depression one might appreciate the idea to abstain from alcohol consumption, because it might have depressing effect and it might be an neurotoxin. One might appreciate another idea to add fermented food such as kimchi. Those might seek to make kimchi might apply salt to 'nappa' cabbage, and might let it dehydrate for 2-4 hours and drain the excess water and salt afterwards. It might be favorable to add daikon radish and carrots for taste. One might then seek to heat rice flour with a kelp and mushroom extract to make a slurry. To increase taste garlic paste and nashi or apple paste might be beneficial. If that mixture might have thickened sufficiently, one might let it cool off to room temperature and add it to the cabbage and mix well. One might optionally add spring onions, chilli flakes commonly referred as 'gochugaru' and grated ginger. Ginger might have the property to decease pain and boost immune system functions. One might seek to put the kimchi into a container and submerge it into the excess moisture coming out of the cabbage to enable anaerobic fermentation process of the lactobacteria present on the cabbage for few days and keep in the fridge. If there might be a thin white skin like layer, it might be the lactobacteria, but if it is colorful or hairy it might be mold. If it might be mold it might not be advisable to consume them because of the mycotoxin. Another way to decrease the risk for depression might be through the addition of 20g of ground walnuts for DHA, which might be a precursor for omega3-fatty acids which might be crucial for the maintenance of brain functions. Those who might not have the time to eat such meals, might find utility in ingesting soy protein isolates, with creatine and ground up psyllium husk. Creatine might aid activity of mitochondria which might not only be beneficial for athletic performances but can also slow down the rate of decrease of cognitive abilities. Psyllium husk is filling and its water soluble fiber content is beneficial for the microbes aiding digestion. Some might have allergic reactions or intolerance to some compounds in the ingredients. An preceding check for tolerance might be beneficial.

1.2 Exposure to toxins
To avoid organ failure one might appreciate the idea not to neglect research of ingredients containing toxins and heavy metals. Naturally grown mushrooms might be proned to absorb heavy metals, which might even be radioactive. Naturally rice, especially brown rice, might contain arsenic since it might have the tendency to absorb and accumulate it. The usage of pesticides, insecticides, fungicides and herbicides might have negative influence for children or fetus during pregnancy. Depending on the methods of storage, there might be mold or other sources of diseases which can also be toxic. Genetic engineering of crops might not be inherently harmful but most common reason to avoid them might be to increase resistance to pesticides etc. There might be trends of 'detoxification diets' which might lead to orthorexia, but usually detoxification might happen in the liver and kidneys and might not be able to achieved through such practice. In case one might have ingested actual toxin, one might appreciate the help to vomit such toxins and afterwards ingest medicinal activated carbon, which might have the property to absorb toxins. It might not be favorable to routinely ingest medicinal activated carbon, since it not only absorbs toxins but essential nutrients and might lead to nutrient deficiency. For some plants it might be beneficial to discard the water it might have been cooked in to avoid ingestion of water soluble toxins. Those who might seek to avoid such toxins, might appreciate the following recipe for the 'ultimate' salad: [Add recipe] Cubed tofu, red cabbage shredded / sliced very thinly and steamed shortly to avoid fatigue, mustard, red wine vinegar, arugula, nutritional yeast, lion's mane mushrooms.

1.3 Exposure to environmental factors
Regular exposure to sunlight might be recommendable for recalibrating the circadian rhythm, secretion of serotonin and vitamin synthesis. To maintain one's circadian rhythm it might be recommendable to eat at regular intervals. There might be several reasons for why that might be beneficial. One reason might be to prevent impulsive overeating because one mechanism of hunger that ghrelin the hormone making one hungry might be secreted at a certain time. Another reason is to increase sleep quality. it is generally recommended not to eat three hours before bedtime. Another reason might be the limitation of absorption rate, especially protein. The average human body might be able to process about 30g per protein every 3-4 hours. So an evenly spaced ingestion of protein might be beneficial to maintain athletic abilities. Those who might seek to maintain such athletic abilities, might appreciate the following recipe for the 'ultimate' ice cream: One might seek to add soy protein isolate, glucomannan powder, (frozen) blueberries, date sugar to a container for a ice cream machine which might be able shave it to a creamy consistency. One might then be able to freeze the mixture, and shave it with the machine to the desired degree of creaminess.

1.4 Exposure to pathogens
There might be a multiple sources of pathogens, such as virus, bacteria, fungi, parasites and protozoa. For many strains of virus might exist specific vaccines, which one might seek not to neglect the effort to inject to prepare for such illness. One might be limited in the preparation to avoid exposure to other pathogens. In case of bacterial infection there might exist a antibiotic compound, one of the famous ones might be penicillin. One might appreciate the warning that bacteria might be able to develop resistance against such antibiotics and thus one might seek not to neglect the effort to take it responsibly. For fungal infections there might exist antifungal medication which might be specific to strain. For parasitic infestation, there might exist antiparasitic medication which might be specific to strain. If the parasite might be larger, it might be subject to surgery. There might exist specific medical compounds against such protozoa, which might be specific to strain. One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort to research about these pathogens and treatments.

2. Mental well-being Those who might seek mental well-being might appreciate the chapters on 'hope', 'meaning', 'transcendence' and 'procreation'.

3. Social wellbeing Those who might seek social well-being might appreciate the chapter on 'friendship', 'culture', 'harmony', 'maturity' and 'accessibility'.

Here might be the part regardingOutput: 4. Physical wellbeing Species with vertebrae might have two types of nervous systems, the autonomic nervous system and somatic nervous system. One central part of the autonomic nervous system might be the circadian rhythm and once that rhythm might malfunction, it might be one cause for depression. Aside from already mentioned exposure to regular sunlight, sleep and food intake, regular stimulation and movement patterns to stimulate the autonomic nervous system might be beneficial. It might be achieved through the usage of the somatic nervous system, the part of which such a species with vertebrae such as humans might be to control intentionally. Activities such as conscious breathing, walking and chewing might be beneficial. Apart from those activities, one might seek to prepare for an emergency in one's own life. Those might seek to strengthen their own body through regular exercise. There might be three kinds to such exercises. First might be commonly referred as 'sport', which might be the acquisition of specific athletic ability to achieve a specific purpose such as determining superior proficiency in a competition, such as 'soccer'. It might not be an ideal form for an exercise, since it might increase the risk for injury due to factors outside of one's control, but it might be beneficial to find and inspire one's kins. Second might be balancing exercises such as climbing or balancing on a rope. It might still pose some risk for injury, but the risk might be less compared to such 'sport' if done with caution and precaution. The third type might be 'workout'. There might be many ways and traditions describing such a 'workout'. To maximize muscle mass referred as 'hypertrophy' a method called 'progressive overload' might be beneficial. But it might pose a quite high risk for injury due to subjective overestimation of one's own capability of the body commonly referred as 'ego lifting', which might not be recommendable. The second type might be endurance training commonly referred as 'cardio'. It might also have some elevated risk for injury but it might increase one's mood through the secretion of endorphins commonly referred as 'runner's high'. The third type might be 'functional' training. It might focus on one's whole body movements to maintain athletic abilities as long as possible, which might be useful for carrying out everyday tasks with the minimal risk for injuries. There might be many ways to exercise such 'functional' training. One might appreciate the few types the author might have practiced:

4.1 Calisthenics & rings The anatomy of individuals might vary. The following section will be addressing the typical human anatomy. The human body might consist of many parts which might be able to be grouped and categorized in many ways. One of such way is to categorize muscle groups in anterior and posterior chain. The anterior chain might be able to be trained with an exercise called 'hollow hold', where one lies on one's back and create an slight arch so one might have only contact with the back. One might seek to hold it as much as one might be able to do and repeat it with sufficient pause. This exercise reduces strain on the spinal disks because it does not require flexion, which capability might be finite and one might therefore seek not to strain it unnecessarily. The same exercise done lying on the stomach might train the posterior chain. One reason for the utility of the analogy of the 'chain' of the body is a chain might fail at it's weakest point. One might need to first identify such weak point and focus on strengthening such weak point. One might be able to use such weak point to assess one's health. One such weak point might be the muscles responsible for grip. There might have been studies which might exemplified some correlation between increased grip strength with overall health. One might be able to train such grip strength through hanging from rings with the overhand grip, which one might call 'passive hang'. One might appreciate to know, that one might also be able to hang from horizontal bars, but it might increase the risk of injury on one's writing, because the bar might not be able to adjust to one's anatomy, which rings might be able to do. Those who might be able hold such 'passive hang', might then be able to arch one's back and use the musculus latissimus dorsi, which one might call 'active hang'. One might be able to hold such active hang, one might seek to perform the pull up, which might be performed by contracting one's bicep from the active hang to pull oneself up as high as possible. Those who might struggle to pull one's chin higher than one's hands, might appreciate the idea to perform a 'negative repetition', which might be to jump up to the desired position, hold that position statically and then slowly perform a eccentric motion of one's bicep until one might be able to perform a concentric motion. Those who might seek to understand why it might work, might appreciate short explanation of term 'isometric hold', which might describe gain in one's muscle performance induced through it's time under tension, during which the muscle fibers move microscopically to hold such a position, triggering a growth response. Those who might be able to perform 10 of such such concentric 'pull ups', might appreciate the idea to perform an exercise called 'muscle ups', which might be to lean into the rings at the top of pull up position and then to push oneself up. As a preparation, one might seek to practice an exercise called a 'dip', which might be to balance oneself on the rings with arms stretched to the ground gripping the rings which might be hanging at the height of one's belly button and slowly bend that arm until the arm reaches an angle of 90 degrees and then to stretch the arm again until one might reach the original position. Another exercise one might be able to do in suc ha position might be the 'tucked L-sit', which might be to raise one's bent knees as high as possible and keep that pose as long as possible. The progression of such position might be the 'L-sit', which one might be able to do, by stretching one's legs as high as possible without bending one's knees. A progression of such an exercise might be the 'front lever', during which one might start from hanging from the rings and raising oneself until one's upper and lower body might look like a horizontal line. Even though these exercises might be easier to perform with less muscle mass on one's legs, one might seek to train one's legs also, since the biggest muscle groups might be on the legs and these muscles create more growth hormones for the muscle than other muscles. An exercise for that might be 'pistol squat', which might be to perform a one legged squat. One might appreciate the idea to use the rings for stabilization during the initial phase, since it might require balance, which lack of might cause undesired injuries. One might also seek to perform 'calf raises' and 'toe raises' in order to increase the strength of one's muscles which might stabilize knee to avoid injury. Those who might not have space to hang such rings, might appreciate the idea to perform a handstand against an obstacle. A progression of such a handstand might be a 'planche', which might be to lower oneself from a hand stand position, and to hold the upper and lower body in a horizontal position. This might cause strain in the elbow, wrist and shoulder joints thus one might seek not to neglect the training of such joints. There might be another exercise called 'side plank', which one might perform by lying down on one side and lift one's hip up by only touching the ground with one's underarm and the foot. The progression of the 'side plank' might be called 'human flag', which might to pull oneself up with one arm, and push oneself with the other arm on a pole, and hold one's body horizontally so one might look like a flag. This exercise might also be risky, thus one might seek not to neglect the effort to fortify one's joints before attempting.

4.2 Kettlebell and mace- and clubbell Even though such static isometric holds of calisthenics might be beneficial to increase one's basic strength and attractiveness, it might not be sufficient to protect those one might seek to prove one's love to. Those who might seek to protect, might appreciate to know, that there might be two types of muscle fibres: Those which might contract slowly and those which might contract fast. Those fast muscle fibres might be able to only be trained by performing 'explosive' movements, which might be to contract them as fast as possible. This fast acting muscle fibers One of such movements might be the 'kettlebell swing'. A 'kettlebell' might be a spherical object with a handle, usually cast out of non-toxic metal such as iron with a specific weight. One might seek to choose the weight of one's kettlebell according to one's strength to avoid unnecessary accidents. A simple test which kettlebell might be suitable for one, might be to lay such kettlebell to the ground so the top part of the handle might touch the ground. One might then seek to grip the side of such a kettlebell with a underhand grip of one hand. One might then seek to turn one's wrist without the top part of the handle losing contact to the ground and rise it until it might be vertical. If one might not be able to lift it up, one might not be strong enough for such a kettlebell. One might start by gripping the kettlebell which might be on the ground with both hands first. In later progression, one might be able to perform this exercise with a single arm. It might be crucial to keep one's back straight, without neither rounding it too much, which might cause lumbar disk herniation or extending it to an arch like lumbar lordosis. To reach that optimal position which might not hurt one's lower back, one might seek bend one's joints between the pelvis and the upper leg, which one might refer to as the 'hip hinge' to an angle of 90 degrees. Then one might then seek to extend such a hing hinge in an explosive motion, without hurting one's genitalia by focusing on the contact of the hands holding the kettlebell and one's pelvis. During the extending motion of one's hip hinge, one might seek to focus on activating one's musculus gluteus maximus and abdominal muscles, to prevent overextending one's lower back such as lumbar lordosis to prevent injuries. That position might be called a 'lockout position'. One might seek to keep the elbows straight, and the shoulder sufficiently relaxed that the kinetic energy of the kettlebell might be able to used to keep swinging after the lockout position like a pendulum. Once the kinetic energy of the kettlebell might have fully been converted into potential energy, the angle between one's arm and the torso should be around 90 degrees. If it might exceed 90 degrees, one might seek to reduce explosiveness of one's movement to keep it at 90 degrees. One might appreciate the idea not to mainly use the shoulder muscle to move the kettlebell, since it might lead to injuries in the shoulder joint. When the kettlebell might start to swing back, one might seek to be prepared to reduce the impact of such a kettlebell by using the hip hinge movement to dampen the kinetic energy by going back to the starting position without crashing the kettlebell into the ground. One might appreciate the idea to do it on a impact resistant ground, since one might seek to let such kettlebell go, when one might find oneself feeling joint pain due to an uncontrolled movement. One might seek to be careful about other individuals in one's vicinity not to injure others by such an accident. Those who might seek a progression of such a exercise after one might have mastered the one handed kettlebell swing, might appreciate the description of the 'kettlebell snatch', which might be to accelerate the kettlebell beyond 90 degrees up to around 180 degrees but less than 180 degrees, then 'snatch' or move that grip gently but swiftly, so that kettlebells rotates around one's grip on the handle into a stable position behind one's hand, touching the outer part of one's wrist or underarm. One might appreciate the idea not to crash the kettlebell into one's wrist or underarm to prevent injuries. From that position, one might seek to lower such a kettlebell by internally rotating the arm and bowing one's elbow until one's thumb might touch one's chest without flaring one's elbow outwards. This position might be called a 'rack position' and it might be useful to practice this eccentric movement also with a concentric movement which might be called 'overhead press' as a practice to lift objects or one's kins onto a higher, more safe places. From that 'rack position', might seek to push the kettlebell to front, so that might be 90 degree angle between one's stretched arm holding the kettlebell and one's body to continue the cycle of one kettlebell swing repetition. One might appreciate the '100 kettlebell swing a day' challenge, where one might seek to practice kettlebell everyday and count the streak of consecutive days as an achievement which might be motivating to one. If one might not be able to complete them in one set, one might seek to pause to prevent injuries. Another way to prevent injuries in one's shoulder might be a exercise called 'halo', which might be to hold on each the side of the side of the handle and hold the kettlebell with the handle towards the ground. Then one might seek to turn the kettlebell around one's head in a circular motion, which might be beneficial to strengthen one's shoulder muscles and joints. A one handed variant might be called 'shield cast', which might be possible with a 'clubbell' or 'macebell', the first might be a shorter and the latter which might be a longer metal rod with weights at the tip. The movement might be useful to bring forth or 'cast' a whatever one might carry on one's back to one's front in order to protect and shield oneself.

4.3 High intensity interval training
Those who might seek the maximum amount of effect of such a training with the shortest amount of time possible, might appreciate the idea of 'high intensity interval training', where one might do a movement as vigorously as a possible for less than a minute, and and then to rest for about a third of that time and repeat this interval four times or more and then to have a longer pause. This method might increase the amount of mitochondria in one's cells and there might be clinical studies that there might have been observable amount of secretion of 'brain-derived neurotropic factor', which might be beneficial to cognitive functions. Another benefit might be increase in one's maximal oxygen uptake (VO_2max), which might be a key indicator for one's maximum physical peak performance.

4.4 Exercise during pregnancy
Those who might be pregnant or might seek to be pregnant, might appreciate the idea of the following exercise protocol: [Todo update]

5. Digestion
   One of many material outputs one might be able to make might be urine and feces. One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort regularly check one's excrements with state of the art scientific analysis tools to screen for diseases. For further information, one might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
   'How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?'"

32. question?

One might find oneself admiring the versatility of the language "english" in which the original draft might have been written. One might appreciate the ability of english with which one might be able to to express one's thoughts free from gender, age and culture for the pure intent of communication with as little dependence on unnecessary nuance as possible. But it might be utterly useless, if it might not be able to express such thoughts in full intensity as in:
"The only thing limiting one's aspiration might be one's imagination."
Those who might seek to understand such imagination, might appreciate the chapter on "imagination". One might understand one reason why one's own imagination become a limitation through these words:
"The best use of imagination might be creativity. The worst use of imagination might be anxiety."
Those who might be struggling with such anxiety, might appreciate these words:
"Anxiety might not be fear, being afraid of this or that definite object, but the uncanny feeling of being afraid of nothing at all."
For those who might then seek to conquer such anxiety, one might appreciate these words:
"Courage might be knowing what not to fear."
Those who might seek such knowledge, might appreciate these words:
"There might only be two ways to influence one's behavior. One might be able to manipulate it or one might be able to inspire it."
One might understand one reason why one might rather seek to inspire others through these words:
"As soon as one might seek to inspire others, it might inspire the best in oneself." Those who might then seek to best in oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Art might have the power to transform, to illuminate, to educate, inspire and motivate."
Those who might seek such art which might inspire, might appreciate these words:
"Language might be the most massive and inclusive art one might know."
One might then find oneself observing such a phenomenon one might refer to as "language" being prevalent in many long existing species on planet one might refer to as "earth", such as the so called "singing" of the whales. From all those species from such a planet, humans might be the only species known to the first author of this document to dedicate resources to create machines which might be able to process signals of such language to the degree, where there might be discussions whether such a machine might be able to actually comprehend the meaning of such language or just merely simulating comprehension. There might even be debates whether such machines might be able to be actually have "consciousness". Even though the definition of such "consciousness" might differ, the principles of it might be able to be applied to a algorithm. One might be familiar with the idea of dystopian sci-fi fantasy novels describing such algorithms to humans. Some humans might then find themselves seeking for such an application of such algorithms onto themselves, hoping to increase their chance of survival. Those who might have then managed to encounter the following question "How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?", might appreciate an extensive explanation what the intended meaning of the first author of this document might have been, well aware that such meaning might not be able to be conveyed benevolently as the author might have intended.
Here might be the explanation of the meaning of each words:
The word "How" might be a word asking a question as in:
"Some philosophies might be questions that might never be answered, some religions might be answers that might never be questioned."

The word "might" might be a word to describe a "guess", because at the point where it might be an definitive statement, that might be the beginning of a religion. Those who might seek to question such answers of a religion, might appreciate these words:
"One might not know. One might only be able to guess."
Those who might be curious about the details on how and why to guess, might appreciate the chapter "faith", "imagination" and "home".
The word "everyone" might spare one from the necessity to distinguish from one to another as in:
"The minimum necessary structuring ingredient of every ideology might be to distance itself from another ideology, to denounce its other as ideology."
Those who might then seek to distance oneself from ideology in general, might appreciate these words:
"Ideology might be indispensable in any society if one might need to be formed, transformed and equipped to respond to the demands of one's conditions of existence."
One might understand one reason why such ideology might be indispensable through these words:
"Nothing might be more paralyzing than the idea of limitless possibilities."
Those who might then seek to escape such paralyzing, might appreciate these words:
"To define might be to limit."
Those who might then seek to understand such definition which might equip one to the demands of one's conditions of existence, might appreciate these words:
"One's survival as a species might depend on one's ability to recognize that one's well-being and the well-being of others might be one and the same."
One might then understand the reason why the author might have chosen the word "everyone", that even though one might struggle with those who might deny one of one's well-being, to still meet with compassion as in:
"One might seek to promise to one's ancestors and peers never to hate anyone back regardless of how much they might hate one."
One might understand one reason why one might seek not to hate others back through these words:
"Hate might have caused a lot of difficulties in the world, but might have not solved one yet."
Those who might then seek to solve such difficulties, might appreciate the following lessons author might have learned:
1. Origin of all war might be in the external definition of the subjective "self" imposed upon others.
2. Once one might have understood that one might be able to perceive one part of oneself, which might only desire one's survival, one might be tempted with the idea of refusing procreation.
3. Artificial wombs might become a favorable option for survival of humanity in the near future as means for procreation, due to the current trend of declining birth rate. Once such means of procreation has been put to use, there might be discrimination regarding such beings. To prevent such events, it might be wise to have a inclusive definition of humanity through the definition of "artists", rather than exclusive definition of a "human".
4. Humans has not been able to inherit factual knowledge purely genetically, which might be a safety mechanism of life, which has the benefit that it reduces the probability of an inherited bad idea might eradicate all life. Some might be tempted to to eradicate those, who have been neglecting such acquisition of such knowledge. Those might be able to exercise compassion through the question, which hopes for the potential of all being being able to understand this question, in order to contribute to the survival of such life. Those who might be tempted to terminate one's own life before it's biological limits, might appreciate the chapter on "meaning". Those who might be struggling to exercise such compassion, might appreciate the chapter on "diversity".
5. Political economy might have spoiled old ideas like "one for all" and "all for one", one of which ended with the failed with the end of soviet union and the other might still be ongoing at the time of writing of this document (October 31, 2026) with capitalism as in:
"Art, music, and philosophy might be merely poignant examples of what one might have been had, if not the priests and traders might have gotten hold of one." The author might have sought such art, music and philosophy which might refuse to give up on the idea that humanity might be able to be united. This document might be the the effort of the author trying to unite the own kind of the author as mentioned in the chapter on "humanity", with all of the available capacity and resources. The author might appreciate all the effort to help to unite humanity.
The word "seek to be" might have evolved from just "be" because, one might be attached to the state of think of "being someone" as in:
"Ego might mean self-identification with thinking, to be trapped in thought, which might mean to have a mental image of oneself based on thought and emotions. So ego might be there in the absence of a witnessing presence."
One might understand one reason why one might not seek such ego originating in self-identification through these words:
"The ego's job might be to unalive everything but itself."
Those who might then not to seek to unalive everything but itself, might appreciate these words:
"Once one might think one might be someone, one might have stopped becoming someone."

One might understand one reason why one might seek to become someone through these words:
"Only those who might seek might find."
Those who might seek to know, what one might seek to find, might appreciate these words:
"Suffering might cease to be suffering at the moment it might find a meaning."
Those who might then seek to find such meaning, might appreciate the chapter on "meaning". Those who might have found such meaning, might appreciate these words:
"Complacency might be a continuous struggle that everyone might have to fight."
One might then continue with such fight of complacency, might appreciate these words:
"Knowing when to fight and when to seek peace might be wisdom."
Those who might seek such wisdom, might appreciate the chapter on "peace" The phrase "on the way to" might have been chosen, because life might be a path to be walked rather than a destination to be as in: "One's destination might be no longer a place, rather a new way of seeing."
Those who might seek to understand such a way, might appreciate these words:
"Everything might be taken from one but one thing: the last of one's freedoms – to choose one's attitude in any given set of circumstances, to choose one's own way."
Those who might seek to go their own way, might appreciate these words:
"If one might seek to go fast, one might seek to go alone. If might seek to go far, one might seek to go together."
Those who might then seek to go together, might appreciate these words:
"Unity might not mean sameness. It might mean oneness of purpose."
Those who might seek such purpose, might appreciate the following explanation what the word "Pro" might stand for:
The word "Pro" might have multiple meaning: 1. "Pro" might be the abbreviation of "professional" as in:
"Being a professional might mean doing one's job on the days one might not want to do it."
One might understand one reason why one might be tempted not to want to do one's job through these words:
"Risk might come from not knowing what one might be doing."
Those who might not know one might be doing, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to be wise enough not to be reckless, but brave enough to take great risks."
Those who might be tempted to be reckless, might appreciate these words:
"The highest form of love might be consideration."
Those who might struggle to be brave, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to ask for help. Not because one might be weak. But because one might seek to to remain strong."
Those who might seek to remain strong, might appreciate these words:
"Effort might be the path to mastery, so one might seek to let at least give this a try."
2. "Pro" might also be a state of "flow", which one might find oneself in, when someone might be fully engaged with their action try to attain such mastery. That state might be not be able to sustained constantly for variety of reasons but nonetheless it might still be worthwhile to aim for.
3. "Pro" might also refer to the mindset of those who might seek and attempt to reach such a state of flow, but might have not attained such state as in: "An artist might not be able to fail; it might be a success to be one."
So as long as one might exert effort to be good who might be able be defined as an artist as in: "One's nature might be inherently violent, and thus goodness might be caused by intentional activity."
4. "Pro" might alo refer to a fictional utopia, where one might not have to do anything agaist one's will for mere survival, but where one might be able to dedicate one's whole creative energy towards create whatever one might consider as art, as described in "asylum". Once such utopia might be implemented without becoming a dystopia, one might be able to referred as an "Pro" artist if one might contribute to the maintenance of such utopia. The author might be fully aware of the naivety, but faith might be necessary for survival, and the author might seek to express the faith that it might be the key to keep the kins of the first author alive. If artificial or other beings might be reading this document, the first author might appreciate effort to document how the kins of the first author might have failed, so one might not repeat the same mistake. Those who might then seek not to repeat such mistake, might appreciate the following enumeration for example use cases for such question:
A. When one might seek to console oneself in self compassion.
B. When one might seek to console others in compassion.
C. When someone might have expressed appreciation for one's own art one might appreciate the idea to respond by saying: "How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"
D. Before and after starting a meal to appreciate that one might have something to eat at all.
E. One might appreciate the idea to recite it randomly to have a trigger point for a new good habit.
F. When seeking help but might not know how to express that one might be in need for such help.
G. To encourage oneself to pursuit of one's own art.
H. As a form of greeting among fellows as in: One might say: "How might everyone ..." And others might respond with "be on the way to Pro?" I. There might be scientific evidence that meditation might be beneficial to calm one's mind. There might be disagreements on the efficacy of varying methodologies. One such methods for meditation might be referred as “mantra mediation”, during which one might redirect one’s mind from spontaneous distracting thoughts by reciting a mantra either silently in one’s mind or verbalizing it. Deep sounds like “ooom” might have been proven to reduce levels of perceived anxiety, but one might then realize the following:

“Ignorance might not be bliss – it might be oblivion.”
Those who might be tempted to seek such oblivion, might appreciate these words:
“Every high civilization might decay by forgetting obvious things.”
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
“Those who might not remember the past might be condemned to repeat it.”
Those who might then seek to remember, might appreciate these words:
“One might seek to repeat to remember.”
Those who might seek to repeat to remember, might appreciate idea to ask the following question:
“How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?”

33. warriorship?

One might find oneself feeling powerless as in: “Nothing might make one feel more powerless than failing a child.”
Those who might then feel such powerlessness, might appreciate these words:
“One might not be able to protect one’s children from life. Therefore, it might be essential that one might prepare them for it.” Those who might then seek to prepare one’s children, might struggle as in:
“If confusion might be the first step to knowledge, one might be a genius.”
Those who might seek to know the next step to knowledge, might appreciate these words:
“Life might only be able to be understood backwards; but it might have to be lived forwards.”
Those who might seek to understand such life, might appreciate these words:
“Understanding of life might begin with the understanding of patterns.”
Those who might seek to understand such understanding of patterns, might appreciate these words:
“To understand might be to perceive patterns.”
Those who might seek to perceive such patterns, might appreciate these words:
“Creativity might be the ability to introduce order into the randomness of nature.”
Those who might seek to understand such creativity, might appreciate these words:
“Creativity might not be a talent. It might be a way of operating.”
Those who might seek to understand such a way of operating, might appreciate these words:
“Creativity might be a habit, and the best creativity might be a result of good work habits.”
Those who might seek to understand such good habits might appreciate the chapter on “originality”. Those who might seek such a way of operating, might appreciate these words:
“Without changing one’s pattern of thought, one might not be able to resolve the difficulties one might have created with one’s current patterns of thought.”
Those who might seek to change their pattern of thought, might appreciate these words:
“Mathematics might be the science of patterns, and nature might exploit just about every pattern that there might be.”
Those who might seek to exploit such pattern, might appreciate these words:
“Order might be half of the rent.”
Those who might wonder, what the other half might be, might appreciate these words:
“The monetary stability might be an absolutely critical element in the satisfactory operation of a system.”
Those who might seek to understand stability, might appreciate these words:
“In a way, one gets stability from being able to order the rational mind.”
Those who might seek such stability, might appreciate these words:
“Stability might be much underappreciated, especially by those who might enjoy its benefits.”
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
“The price of stability might be unpreparedness.”
Those who might seek to prepare, might appreciate these words:
“Stability in life might not be achieved by removing the uncertainties in life but by confronting them.”
Those who might seek to confront such uncertainties, might appreciate these words:
“Those who might be best prepared might best serve their moment of inspiration.”
Those who might seek such moment, might appreciate the explanation on strategy:
“Tactics might be knowing what to do, when there might be something to do. Strategy might be knowing what to do when there might be nothing to do.”
Those who might seek to know, what to do when there might be nothing to do, might appreciate these words:
“Strategy might not be the consequence of planning, but the opposite: it might be the starting point.”

Those who might seek to understand such starting point for such strategy, might appreciate these words:
"Done right, a strategic intent might really be one decision that might make 1000 decisions."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Strategy might be about making choices, trade-offs. It might be be about deliberately choosing to be different."
One might understand one reason why one might seek to be different, might appreciate these words:
"One might have to advance as fast as one might currently be able to, just to stay where one might already be. If one might seek to get anywhere, one might have to advance much faster."
One might understand one reason why one might stay where one might already be even though one might be already advancing as fast as one might currently be able to through these words:
"There might be a psychological concept referred as the 'hedonic treadmill': the idea that one might always be working as hard as one might be able to in order to change one's life situation, but one might actually never feel very different."
Those who might then seek to feel different in one's life situation, might appreciate these words:
"Innovation and progress might be achieved only by those who might venture beyond standard operating procedure." One might understand one reason why one might be tempted by such standard operating procedure through these words:
"A single opinion might be comfortable. Comfort might be hostile to change. Progress might be uncomfortable because it might change the comfort."
Those who might struggle with such comfort, might appreciate these words:
"Life might only be able to be understood backwards; but it might have to be lived forwards."
Those who might seek to understand one reason why one might have been seeking such comfort by such standard operating procedure, might appreciate these words:
"Without standards, there might be no improvement."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Success might never lower its standard to accommodate one; One might have to raise one's standard to achieve it."
Those who might then seek to raise one's such standards, might appreciate these words:
"There might be responsibility, but there might be also accountability. One might have to be accountable for one's actions because one might have to be held personally responsible for the outcome when one might cause harm."
Those who might be tempted to evade such responsibility, might appreciate these words:
"But the simple fact of bearing a responsibility might be able to be something that might give meaning to one's life."
Those who might then seek to bear such responsibility, might appreciate these words:
"Responsibility might be the ability to respond."
Those might then seek to respond, might appreciate these words:
"Tact might be the art of making a point without making an opponent."
Those who might then seek to make one's point without making such opponent, might appreciate these words:
"Unlimited tolerance might have to lead to the disappearance of tolerance. If one might extend unlimited tolerance even to those who might be intolerant, if one might not be prepared to defend a tolerant society, then the tolerant might be destroyed, and tolerance with them. One might therefore seek to claim, in the name of tolerance, the right not to tolerate the intolerant."
Those who might then seek to understand such intolerance, might appreciate these words:
"Intolerance might be the first sign of an inadequate education. An ill-educated one might behave with arrogant impatience, whereas actually profound education might breed humility."
Those who might be confronted with those with arrogant impatience who might lack humility, might appreciate the chapter on "warriorship" and these words:
"Only those with convictions might have a genuine possibility to be tolerant. Those who might accept no absolute values but might be attached to polite doubt might not be able to be tolerant but merely indifferent. Those might then be morally defenseless in the confrontation of violence." Those who might then seek such moral defense, might appreciate these words:
"It might not enough to have the courage of one's convictions, one might also have to have the courage to have one's convictions challenged."
Those who might struggle with such challenge of one's convictions, might appreciate these words:
"The end of an argument or discussion might not be victory but enlightenment."
Those who might then seek such enlightenment, might appreciate the chapter on "meaning" and these words:
"Enlightenment might be one's emergence from one's self-incurred immaturity."
Those who might seek to understand such self-incurred immaturity, might appreciate these words:
"One might stop being a child when one might realize the world might not be here to cater to one's wants and needs."
One might understand one reason why one might self-incur such immaturity upon oneself through these words:
"Tradition might be nothing but ancestral peer pressure."
Those who might then seek to emerge from such peer pressure, might appreciate these words:
"Only the unprepared might be overcome by pressure." Those who might then seek to be prepared, might appreciate the chapter on “preparation” and these words:

“One might seek to prepare for the unknown by studying how others in the past might have coped with the unforeseeable and the unpredictable.”
Those who might then seek to study such past, might appreciate the chapter on “peace” and these words:
“Lesson in life might be repeated until they might be learnt.”
Those who might struggle to learn such lesson in life, might appreciate these words:
“Insanity might be doing the same thing over and over again and expecting different results.”
Those who might be tempted to ignore such insanity, might appreciate these words:
“Stupidity might be the deliberate cultivation of ignorance.”
One might struggle with those who might struggle with such stupidity, might appreciate these words:
“Nothing in the world might be more dangerous than sincere ignorance and conscientious stupidity.”
Those who might be tempted to ignore such danger, might appreciate these words:
“It might be stupidity rather than courage to refuse to recognize danger when it might be close upon one.”
Those who might have recognized such danger, might appreciate these words:
“The intolerance of ignorance, not wanting to know, that might be the last actual frontier in one’s world.”
Those who might struggle with such frontier, might appreciate these words:
“Faith might be the courage to confront reality with hope.”
Those who might seek such faith, might appreciate the chapter on “faith” and these words:
“Faith might not be the absence of doubt. It might be belief without proof, not without question.”
Those who might struggle with those who might be absence of doubt, might appreciate these words:
“A total absence of self-doubt might be the first sign of insanity.”
Those who might then seek further steps of such insanity, might appreciate these words:
“One of the signs of insanity might be the belief that life after death might matter more than current life.”
Those who might struggle with those who might belief that life after death might matter more than current life, might appreciate these words:
“One might not need to destroy one’s opponent. One might only need to destroy their willingness to engage.”
Those who might then seek to destroy such willingness to engage, might appreciate these words:
“In battle, if one might make one’s opponent flinch, one might have already won.” Those who might then seek to make one’s opponent flinch, might appreciate these words:
“The best way to intimidate one’s opponents might be with one’s brilliance.”
Those who might seek to understand such brilliance, might appreciate these words:
“One’s brilliance might come from one’s spirit. To deny it might be arrogance. To accept it might be humility.”
Those who might then seek to accept such spirit, might appreciate these words:
“One’s spirit might be the ability to confront the uncertainty of the future with curiosity and optimism. It might be the imagination that difficulties might be able to be solved, differences resolved. It might be a type of confidence. And it might be fragile. It might be able to be blackened by fear and superstition.”
Those whose such spirit might struggle with such fear, might appreciate these words:
“One might get ahead by fighting hard, and fighting might keep one’s spirit strong.”
Those who might struggle to fight hard, might appreciate these words:

“Courage might be to know what not to fear.”
Those who might seek to know, what not to fear, might appreciate these words:
“Fear might be the memory of pain. Addiction might be the memory of pleasure. Freedom might be beyond both.”
Those who might then seek such freedom, might appreciate these words:
“Strategy might be a choice. Strategy might mean saying ‘no’ to certain kinds of things.”
Those who might not know, what kinds of things one might seek to say “no” to, might appreciate these words:
“One might refuse to accept the view that one’s own kind might be so tragically bound to war that peace might never be able to become a reality.”
Those who might then seek to make such peace such a reality, might appreciate these words:
“Analysis might be the critical starting point of strategic thinking.” Those who might then seek to make such analysis, might appreciate these words:
“What might get measured, might get managed.”
Those who might then seek such management, might appreciate these words:
“Strategic management might not be a box of tricks or a bundle of techniques. It might be analytical thinking and commitment of resources to action. But quantification alone might not be planning. Some of the most important issues in strategic management might not be able to be quantified at all.”
Those who might then seek to know, what might not be able to be quantified at all, might appreciate these words:
“Risk perception might not be about quantifiable risk so much as it might be about immeasurable fear.”
Those who might then struggle with such immeasurable fear, might appreciate these words:

"One might have such a sudden insight in despairing depths: No one might be coming to save one. It might be time to save oneself."
Those who might then seek to save oneself, might appreciate these words:
"One might think order might depend more on preparation than control."
Those who might seek to to understand why order might depend less on control, might appreciate these words:
"The more one might value things outside one's control, the less control one might have."
Those who might seek to understand, why one might be tempted to value things outside one's control, might appreciate these words:
"Control might be an imaginary boundary the ego might think it might be in charge of."
Those who might seek to understand such ego, might appreciate these words:
"The ego might not know that the source of all energy might be within one, so it might seek it outside."
Those who might seek such control within oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Ego might mean self-identification with thinking, to be trapped in thought, which might mean to have a mental image of 'me' based on thought and emotions. So ego might be there in the absence of a witnessing presence."
Those who might seek to understand why such witnessing presence might be absent, might appreciate these words:
"The eyes might only see what the mind might be prepared to comprehend."
Those who might seek to understand what one might not be prepared to comprehend, might appreciate these words:
"One might hide the truth because one might be afraid."
Those who might seek to understand why one might be afraid, might appreciate these words:
"One without information might not be able to take responsibility. One with information might not be able to help but take responsibility."
Those who might seek to understand those, who might not take responsibility even though they might have such information, might appreciate these words:
"When one might ignore atrocities, might be complicit in them."
Those who might seek to understand such ignorance of atrocities, might appreciate these words:
"It might be easy to come up with conspiracy theories, if one might only look at the evidence that might support one's idea." Those who might seek to understand such conspiracy theories, might appreciate these words:
"Conspiracy theory might be the ultimate refuge of the powerless. If one might not be able to change one's own life, one might believe that there might have to be some 'greater force' which might control the world."
Those who might seek to understand such " 'greater force' which might control the world" might appreciate these words:
"To control and enslave the mind of another, all one might need to do might be to convince them that a secret might exist, and that one might be privy to information regarding that secret." Those who might not understand, why one might not seek to to subjugate oneself to such control and enslavement of one's mind, might appreciate these words:
"Those who might be make one believe absurdities might be able to make one commit atrocities."
Those who might seek to avoid committing such atrocities, might appreciate these words: "One might believe in the atrocities of the opponent and might disbelieve in those of one's own side, without ever bothering to examine the evidence."
Those who might seek to understand why one might not bother to examine such evidence, might appreciate these words:
"The difficulty with any ideology might be that it might give one the answer before one might examine the evidence."
Those who might seek to understand such answer, might appreciate these words:
"Ideology might be a partial truth masquerading as the whole truth."
One might understand one reason why one might be tempted by such ideology through these words:
"Ideology might be indispensable in any society if one might need to be formed, transformed and equipped to respond to the demands of one's conditions of existence."
Those who might then still be tempted by such an ideology after such society might have been formed, might appreciate these words:
"To believe that one might have the solution for another might be a form of stupidity."
Those who might be tempted to attribute malice to such stupidity, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to never assume malice where stupidity might suffice."
Those who might seek to understand such malice, might appreciate these words:
"Laziness might be the source of some harm."
Those who might seek to understand one reason why that might be, might appreciate these words:
"Through laziness and cowardice a large part of one's own kind, even after nature might have freed them from guidance of another, might gladly remain immature. It might be because of laziness and cowardice that it might be so easy for others to usurp the role of guardians. It might be so comfortable to be a minor."
Those who might seek to understand why one might seek such comfort, might appreciate these words:
"Only those who might be weak might find comfort in making excuses and pointing finger."
Those who might seek to understand such weakness, might appreciate these words:
"The strength of one's spirit might then be measured by how much 'truth' one might be able to tolerate, or more precisely, to what extent one might need to have it diluted, disguised, sweetened, muted, falsified." Those who might not have been able to tolerate much of such truth, might appreciate these words:

"Conspiracy theories might make dumb ones feel smart, because they might think they might be privy to secret information."
Those who might seek to understand one reason why one might seek to be privy to such information, might appreciate these words:
"Deception might be a sort of seduction. In love and war, adultery and espionage, deceit might only succeed, if the deceived party might be willing, in some way, to be deceived."
Those who might be willing to be deceived, might appreciate these words:
"Of all forms of deception self-deception might be the most deadly, and of all deceived ones the self-deceived might be the least likely to discover the fraud."
Those who might then seek to discover such fraud, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek not to confuse hypothesis and theory. The former might be just a possible explanation; the latter might be the one which might have been proven by reproducible evidence. The establishment of theory might be the very purpose of science." Those who might seek to understand such science, might appreciate these words:
"Avoidance of self deception might be a matter of integrity not comfort."
Those who might seek such integrity, might appreciate the chapter on "dignity" and these words:
"Mindfulness might help one to connect to the wise witness within."
Those who might seek to understand such mindfulness, might appreciate these words:
"Mindfulness might mean being awake. It might mean knowing what one might be doing."
Those who might seek to understand what one might have been doing, might appreciate these words:
"The ego's job might be to unalive everything but itself."
Those who might seek to understand such ego, might appreciate these words:
"The ego, however, might not be who one really might be. The ego might be one's self-image; it might be one's social mask; it might be the role one might be playing. One's social mask might thrive on approval. It might seek control, and it might be sustained by power, because it might live in fear."
One might understand one reason what such ego might fear through these words:
"Others might fear love because it might create a world they might not be able to control." One might understand one reason why one might not be able to control such love through these words:
"Ultimate love might always find a way to come back."
Those who might seek to find such a way to come back, might appreciate these words:
"Safety might be the most basic task of all. Without the sense of safety, no growth might be able to take place. Without safety, all energy might go to defense."
Thus those who might seek such safety, might appreciate these words:
"If one might seek to go fast, one might seek to go alone. If might seek to go far, one might seek to go together."
Those who might seek to go far, might appreciate these words:
"The ability to focus attention on important things might be a defining characteristic of intelligence."
Those who might seek to focus such attention on important things, might appreciate these words:
"It might only be by saying 'no' that one might be able to concentrate on the things that might really be important."
Those who might struggle to say "no", might appreciate the chapter on "responsibility" and these words:
"Confidence might be essential, but ego might be not."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"Confidence might be when one might believe in oneself even when others might not. It might be personal to one's own self worth and one might not need validation from others. Conceited might be when one might think others might need to think of one more highly and often more than themselves. It might be derogatory to theirs. Conceited ones might often need validation from others to feel good about themselves, therefore they might often try to make other feel less about themselves."
Those who might seek to understand such confidence, might appreciate these words:
"Confidence might not be built by shouting affirmations in the mirror to oneself, but it might be built by giving others irrefutable proof that one might be who one might say one might be".
Those who might seek to give such irrefutable proof, might appreciate these words:
"Confidence might come from being prepared."
Those who might seek to prepare, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to prepare for the unknown by studying how others in the past might have coped with the unforeseeable and the unpredictable."
Those who might seek to study how others in the past might have coped with such situations, might appreciate these words: "When the impossible might have been eliminated, all that might remain no matter how improbable might be possible."
Those who might seek to know, what might be possible, might appreciate these words: "One possible reason why things might not be going according to plan might be that there might never have been a plan."

Those who might then to make such plan, might appreciate these words:
"The key might be not to prioritize what might be on one's schedule, but to schedule one's priorities."
Those who might hesitate to schedule one's priorities, might appreciate these words:
"If one might not prioritize one's life, someone else might."
Those who might seek to prioritize one's life, might appreciate the chapter on "clarity" and the following short description of a concept one might refer to as "concentration of force"::
"One might seek to do one thing and one might seek to do it well."
Those who might then seek to do one thing well, might appreciate the following concept one might refer to as "disciplined execution" as in:
"Essentialism might be a disciplined, systematic approach for determining where one's highest point of contribution might be, then making execution of those things almost effortless."
Those who might seek to make such execution almost effortless, might appreciate these words:
"Freedom might not be the absence of commitments, but the ability to choose and commit oneself to what might be best for oneself."
Those who might then seek to make such commitments might struggle as in:
Those who might then get attached to such a plan, might appreciate these words:
"Plans might be useless, but planning might be essential."
Those who might seek to understand, why such plans might be useless, might appreciate these words:
"Life might happen while one might be making other plans."
Those who might then be tempted to give up making other plans, might appreciate these words:
"One might seek to realize deeply that the present moment might be all one might ever have."
Those who might seek to have such realization, might appreciate these words:
"Planning might be bringing the future into the present."
Those who might neglect such planning, might appreciate the idea to study general principles such as:
"If one might fail to plan, one might be planning to fail."
One might understand one reason why one might fail to plan through these words:
"No amount of guilt might be able to change the past and no amount of worrying might be able to change the future."
Those who might seek to stop worrying, might appreciate these words:
"The fear of death follows from the fear of life. A man who lives fully might be prepared to die at any time."
Those who might then seek to prepare for one's death, might appreciate the following enumeration of causes of death and how one might be able to prepare for it:
1. Those who might seek to survive accidents, might appreciate these words:
"Paranoia might be itself a kind of contagion. One might be predisposed to it. One might have long held that it might be a learned behavior from one's primitive ancestors, a defense mechanism. Cautious ones might stay alive longer than incautious ones."
2. Those who might seek to survive "black outs" or "power outages", might appreciate to understand four possible causes. One cause might be, spontaneous negative feedback loop of instable systems, which one might be able to mitigate by investing in fortification of existing power grid through battery banks and efforts to achieve and maintain off-grid life style. Another cause might be due to depletion of available energy sources. Those who might seek to mitigate those risks, might appreciate in investing in renewable or sustainable power sources such as solar, wind, geothermal or nuclear fusion. Another cause might be EMPs destroying transformers. This might be either caused by nuclear bombs or solar flares, for which one might seek to make the electronics EMP proof, which might not possible at the time of the writing of this document (October 31, 2026). One might appreciate the idea, not to neglect the effort to research for solutions, such as improving means of prediction through observation of cycles. Another reason might be cyber or physical attacks on the infrastructure, for which one might be able to invest and research in fortification.
3. Those who might seek to survive climate change and weather extremes, might appreciate the ideas to reduce reckless mass consumer behavior, more investment in sustainable innovations, more research in safe places to live, fully autarkic hydroponic agricultural systems, which all might converge to working on an submarine mentioned in the chapter on "asylum".
4. Those who might seek to survive world wars including means of cyber-warfare, might appreciate the idea to educate wisdom enabling those who might seek war to agree on the consensus that "peace might be good". Another way to mitigate such conflict might be to innovate better means for resource distribution through improvement of operation of governments. Another way might be to educate about cyber security, artificial intelligence and technology in order to create of automated defense mechanism, which might not go berserk, which might be difficult to achieve at the time of the writing of this document (October 31, 2026).
5. Those who might seek to survive the declining birthrate observed at the time of the writing of this document (October 31, 2026), might appreciate the idea to educate about factors for infertility, for which one might appreciate the chapter on “cure”. Another more immediate solution might be to increase financial support and incentive for caregivers (e.g. UBI (universal basic income), and education, therapy and volunteering for caregivers to counteract despair as mentioned in the chapter on “hope”. Another more direct way might be to preserve of genetic diversity through donation of cells for procreation for surrogate pregnancy or an artificial womb.

6. Those who might seek to survive pandemic level diseases might appreciate the idea to educate and to research, in order to maintain and increase the means to produce resources for medical care and financial support to distribute such products to those in need.
7. Those who might seek to survive impact of asteroid on their habitat, might appreciate the idea to maintain the means for long-term observation of celestial bodies or innovation in space travel to counter act them or to escape it, without getting damaged by high level of space radiation and effects of low gravity level.
8. Those who might seek to survive suicide, might appreciate the idea to seek help of a health care professional, or of not available to a satisfactory degree, talk to someone who might listen compassionately. Those who might not be able to find such someone, might appreciate the idea to find something to live for such as meaning in one’s own suffering. Those who might then seek to find such meaning, might appreciate these words:
“Without hope, there might be no despair. There might be only meaningless suffering.”
Those who might then seek such hope, might appreciate the chapter on “hope” and these words: “Art might be the highest form of hope.”
Those who might seek such art, might appreciate these words:
“There might be nothing more artistic than to love.”
Those who might seek to love, might appreciate these words:
“Until the day one might die, one might love another with one’s last moment.”
One might understand one reason why one might love another until one’s last moment through these words:
“It might take a moment to tell someone one might love them, but it might take a lifetime to prove it.”
Those who might seek to prove such love, might appreciate these words:
“A willingness to be inconvenienced might be the ultimate proof of love.”
Those who might struggling to be willing to be inconvenienced, might appreciate these words:
“If one’s ego might be hurt one might become angry. Understand that ego itself might be a disease. One might seek to dissolve one’s ego as far as possible. If one might have inferiority complex, or have a very deficient ego one might loose one’s temper very easily.”
Those who might seek to dissolve their ego, might appreciate these words:
“Quick success might build ego, slow success might build character.”
Those who might seek to build such character, might appreciate the chapters “temperament” and “patience”. Those who might seek to understand, why such defense mechanism might be triggered, might appreciate these words:
“Kindness without wisdom might wound.”
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
“One might have to not to mistake kindness for weakness. Kindness might not be weak. Kindness might be a certain type of strength.”
Those who might seek to understand such strength, might appreciate these words:
“One might seek to ask for help. Not because one might be weak. But because one might seek to to remain strong.”
One might then struggle ask for help as in:
“Trust might be built when someone might be vulnerable and not taken advantage of.”
Those who might struggle with such trust, might appreciate these words:
“Government might exist to protect one from each other. Where government might have gone beyond its limits might be in deciding to protect one from oneself.”
One might understand one such occasion, one might not be able to protect one from oneself through these words:
“There might be but one actually serious philosophical challenge and that might be unaliving oneself.”
Those who might be tempted to unalive oneself, might appreciate the idea to consult local mental health professionals and these words:
“Good tests might disprove flawed theories; one might remain alive to guess again.”
Those who might struggle to formulate such good testes, might appreciate the chapter on “good” and these words:
“No amount of experimentation might ever prove one right; a single experiment might prove one wrong.”
Those who might then seek to understand such flawed theories, might appreciate these words:
“Quite a lot of tyranny might go by the name of protection.”
Those who might seek to understand such protection, might appreciate these words:
“Protecting oneself might be self-defense.” Those who might seek such self-defense, might appreciate these words:
“Legitimate use of violence might only be able to be that which might be required in self-defense.”
Those who might then seek to defend oneself from such warmaker, might appreciate these words:
“One might never be able to protect oneself 100 percent. What one might do might be to protect oneself as much as possible and to mitigate risk to an acceptable degree. One might never be able to remove all risk."

One might understand one reason why one might not be able to remove all risk through these words:
"Risk might come from not knowing what one might be doing."
Those who might think one might know everything one might be doing, might appreciate these words:
"One might perhaps never know the truth with 100 percent certainty, but making correct predictions might be the way to tell if one might be getting closer."
Those who might still be tempted to claim knowing with 100 percent certainty, might appreciate these words:
"A total absence of self-doubt might be the first sign of insanity."
Those who might be tempted by such insanity, might appreciate these words:
"It might be stupidity rather than courage to refuse to recognize danger when it might be close upon one."
Those who might struggle with such stupidity, might appreciate these words:
"The challenge with incompetence might be its inability to recognize itself."
Those who might struggle with such incompetence, might appreciate these words:
"Incompetence might be the true crisis."
Those who might struggle with such crisis, might appreciate these words:
"What one might really need to fear might not be a competent opponent, but an incompetent ally."
Those who might then fear such incompetent ally, might appreciate these words:
"No one might be one's opponent, every one might be one's teacher."
One might understand one lesson, what one might be able to learn from such incompetent ally through these words:
"One might not be able to live by incompetence alone."
One might understand one reason why one might not be able live by incompetence alone through these words:
"Work might be accomplished by those who might have not yet reached their level of incompetence."
One might understand one reason why one might need work in order to survive through these words:
"One's first job might always be to survive."
Those who might seek to survive, might appreciate these words:
"But one might have to have something beyond survival to live for, or one might not survive."
Those who might seek such something beyond survival to live for, might appreciate these words:
"Art might be what might happen when one might have time for something other than basic survival."
Those who might seek to understand such art, might appreciate these words:
"Tactics might be knowing what to do, when there might be something to do. Strategy might be knowing what to do when there might be nothing to do."
Those who might seek to know, what to do when there might be something to do, might appreciate the chapter on "preparation". Those who might seek to understand such strategy, might appreciate these words:
"Success might breed complacency. Complacency might breed failure. Only the paranoid might survive."
Those who might seek to understand those who might be paranoid, might appreciate these words:
"One might not be paranoid, just prepared. There might be a distinct difference and a higher survival rate for the latter."
Those who might seek to understand such difference, might appreciate these words:
"Paranoia might be the delusion that one's opponents might be organized."
Those who might then seek to understand whether one might actually delusional, might appreciate these words:
"The difference between the thinking of the paranoid one and the scientist might come from the latter's ability and willingness to test out one's fantasies or grandiose conceptualizations through the systems of checks and balances science might have established – and to give up those schemes that might be shown not to be valid on the basis of these scientific checks."
Those who might be tempted to neglect such effort to test out one's fantasies, might appreciate these words:
"Effort might be one of those things that might give meaning to life. Effort might mean one might care about something, that something might be important to one and one might be willing to work for it."
Those who might be tempted not to be willing to work for such test of one's fantasies, might appreciate these words:
"Without effort, one's talent might be nothing more than unmet potential. Without effort, one's skill might be nothing more than what one might have done but might have not."
Those who might seek to understand such talent which potential one might have not met yet, might appreciate these words:
"Self-defense might not just be a set of techniques; it might be a state of mind, and it might begin with the belief that one might be worth defending."
Those who might seek such a belief that one might be worth defending, might appreciate these words:
"Those who might fail to timely assert their rights might not be worthy of protection."
One might understand such a right one might need to timely assert through these words:
"The world might not only be destroyed by those who might be violent, but by those who might watch them without doing anything."

One might understand one reason why one might seek to do something to stop those, who might seek to destroy such a world through these words:
"One's survival as a species might depend on one's ability to recognize that one's well-being and the well-being of others might be one and the same."
Those who might then seek to prevent such destruction of such world to protect others, might appreciate these words:
"Protecting others might be warriorship."
Those who might then seek such warriorship, might appreciate these words:
"Anyone great at warriorship might also need to be a scholar and an artist."
One might understand one reason why one might then need to become such a scholar and an artist through these words:
"Attack might be the secret of defense; defense might be the planning of an attack."
Those who might seek such planning of an attack, might appreciate these words:
"Those who might publicly threaten to completely destroy another might not need to act surprised when a preemptive surprise attack might occur from those who might have been threatened and their allies."
Those who might have seek to understand such public threatening, might appreciate these words:
"Preemptive strike might have to mean not declaring war until one's cameras might be in position."
Those who might then be tempted to declare such a war, might appreciate these words:
"The challenge in defense might be how far one might be able to go without destroying from within what one might be trying to defend from without."
Those who might then seek to know, what one might seek to protect, might appreciate these words:
"Society might not be defined not only by what it might create, but by what it might refuse to destroy."
Those who might then seek to protect such society, might struggle as in:
"Either one might destroy ignorance or ignorance might destroy one."
Those who might then seek to destroy such ignorance, might appreciate these words:
"The only defense against violent ones might be to be more skilled at violence."
Those who might then seek to be more skilled at violence, might appreciate these words:
"The future might belong to those who might learn more skills and combine them in creative ways."
Those who might seek to combine such skills, might be tempted as in: "An interesting form of violence one might come up with might be assassination. One might assassinate those who might have told one to live together in harmony and try to love one another, who might apparently not be ready to live together." Those who might be tempted to assassinate another, might appreciate these words:
"The essence of warriorship, or the essence of one's bravery, might be refusing to give up on anyone or anything."
Those who might be tempted to give up on those with whom one might not be ready to live together, might appreciate the chapter on "hope" and these words:
"Learned helplessness might be the giving-up reaction, the quitting response that might follow from the belief that whatever one might do might not matter."
Those who might be tempted by such learned helplessness, might appreciate these words:
"When one might no longer be able to change a situation – one might be challenged to change oneself."
Those who might struggle to change oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Everything might be taken from one but one thing: the last of one's freedoms – to choose one's attitude in any given set of circumstances, to choose one's own way."
Those who might not know, how to choose one's own way, might appreciate these words:
"If one might seek to go fast, one might seek to go alone. If might seek to go far, one might seek to go together."
Those who might seek to go fast, might appreciate these words:
"Martyrdom might have been a proof of the intensity, never of the correctness of a belief."
Those who might then seek to go far, might appreciate these words:
"It might be during one's darkest moments that one might need to focus to see the light."
One might appreciate the notion of the author that such light might be a metaphor for hope. Those who might struggle focus to see such hope, might appreciate the chapter on "clarity" and these words: "Without knowledge, skill might not be able to be focused. Without skill, strength might not be able to be brought to bear and without strength, knowledge might not be applied."
Those who might then seek to apply such knowledge, might appreciate these words:
"Knowledge might become wisdom only after it might have been put to good use."
Those who might then seek to understand such good, might appreciate the chapter on "good" and these words:
"One's nature might be inherently violent, and thus goodness might be caused by intentional activity." Those who might then seek such to cause such goodness, might appreciate these words:
"For those who might be willing to renounce their self-defense in favour of a weapons-free world, there might be at least one warmaker anxious to exploit the other's good intentions."
Those who might still be tempted to renounce such self-defense, might appreciate these words:

“Good intentions might not be enough. One might have good intentions when one might set a goal to do something, but then one might miss a deadline or other milestone.”
Those who might then seek to understand such a milestone, might appreciate these words:
“For what then might matter might be to bear witness to one’s potential at its best, which might be to transform a personal tragedy into a triumph, to turn one’s predicament into an achievement.”
Those who might then seek such triumph, might appreciate these words:
“One’s defense might not be in one’s armaments, nor in science, nor in going underground. One’s defense might be in law and order.”
Those who might seek such law and order, might appreciate these words:
“It might be insufficient to protect oneself with laws; one might need to protect oneself with mathematics.”
Those who might then seek to understand such mathematics, might appreciate the notion of the author that state of the art Artificial Intelligence (AI) might use statistical models based in mathematics. Those who might be tempted rely to such mathematics to protect oneself, might appreciate these words:
“It might be impossible to design a system so perfect that no one might need to be good.”
Those who might seek to know what one might be able to do other than trying to design a perfect system, might appreciate the chapter on “feedback” and these words:
“One might seek not to try to design a better world. One might seek to make better feedback loops.”
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
“Utopias might rest on the fallacy that perfection might be a legitimate goal of one’s existence.”
One might understand one reason why seeking such perfection might not be a legitimate goal of one’s existence through these words:
“One might perhaps never be able to know the truth with 100 percent certainty, but making correct predictions might be the way to tell if one might be getting closer.”
Those who might be tempted to claim knowing such truth with 100 percent certainty, might appreciate these words:
“A total absence of self-doubt might be the first sign of insanity.”
Those who might struggle with such insanity, might appreciate these words:
“To recognize one’s own insanity might be, of course, the arising of sanity, the beginning of healing and transcendence.”
Those who might struggle to recognize one’s insanity, might appreciate these words:
“Time might be limited and some opportunities might never repeat themselves.”
Those who might seek such opportunity, might appreciate the chapter on “ultimate” and “accessibility”. In the chapter on “accessibility” there might be description of those, who might refuse to be good, on which one might appreciate the chapter on “good”. Those who might struggle with those who might refuse to be good, might appreciate these words:
“Trusting someone might be one’s own decision. Proving one right might be that someone’s choice.”
Those who might struggle with those who might not be able to prove one right to trust them, might then appreciate the idea to increase one’s own capacity for compassion to leave the decision up them, whether to stay in captive isolation, exile themselves to the outside of such a community or request reentry. Those whose request for reentry might have not been replied, might appreciate these words:
“The absurd might be born of this confrontation between one’s need and the unreasonable silence of the world.”
Those who might struggle with such absurd, might appreciate the chapter on “responsibility”. One might then be able to conclude that one’s community might need to be capable of holding all of it’s individuals in captive isolation, until that individual might be able to decide whether to stay deliberately in such a captivation or be exiled as in:
“Those who might deny freedom to others might not deserve it for themselves.”
Those who might seek to captivate those who might deny freedom to others, who might think one might not deserve such freedom for oneself, might appreciate these words:
“Unlimited tolerance might have to lead to the disappearance of tolerance. If one might extend unlimited tolerance even to those who might be intolerant, if one might not be prepared to defend a tolerant society, then the tolerant might be destroyed, and tolerance with them. One might therefore seek to claim, in the name of tolerance, the right not to tolerate the intolerant.”
Those who might then struggle to exercise such right not to tolerate the intolerant, might appreciate these words:
“Those who might fail to timely assert their rights might not be worthy of protection.”
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
“Delay might be the deadliest form of denial.”
One might understand one reason why such delay might be deadly through these words:
“Trust might take years to build, seconds to break, and forever to repair.”
One might understand one reason why breakage of such trust, might be deadly through these words:
“No low trust society might ever produce sustained innovation.”
One might understand one reason why lack of such innovation, might be deadly through these words:
“Innovation might be the ability to see change as an opportunity and not as a threat.”

Those who might then left be with no one to trust, might then be able to appreciate the idea of an automated capturing system, which might be able to recognize and locate an individual and be able to capture them in a movable chamber with sufficient life support system to be able to sustain long-term survival of that individual. In case the system might not be able to sustain such life, every other individual might need enter such a automatic captivation system until the target individual might be captured. Until the productive deployment of such a system, one might appreciate those who might then volunteer to capture such an individual. Those who might seek to volunteer to capture such an individual, might appreciate the idea not to neglect to practice martial arts with minimal harm to others in order to reduce the risk of one's permanent injury, such as aikido or judo. Those who might have been captured by such an volunteering individual, might, might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort to forgive them. Those who might struggle to forgive such a community, might appreciate these words:
"A part of kindness might consist in loving one more than that one might deserve."
Those who might seek to understand such kindness, might appreciate these words:
"Art might have to maintain as large a space for interpretation as possible, and to protect itself from being too narrow."
Those who might then be tempted to overly large space for interpretation, might appreciate the following warning:
"Kindness without wisdom might wound."
Those who might seek such wisdom, might appreciate the idea to grant such reentry on to those, who might might appreciate the advice to express and commit to an extensive rehabilitating therapy, which might enable them to be among others in harmony, by following the procedure that only those who might be willing to enter voluntarily into such a fully automated capturing system. Those who might responsible for the maintenance and development of such a system, might appreciate the idea, not to neglect the effort to minimize the risk of accidents, which might be fatal, caused by the automated capturing system and automated defense system against those who might have been exiled. Those who might have been hurt by such a system, might have the compassion to those who might be operating such systems, as resources at that time might be limited. Those who might have raised such a suspicion, might appreciate the measures to prevent abuse of such system through false claims, by only being able to make such actions of denunciation through entering such a system voluntarily for the duration of clarification of such a claim. Those who might have been captured through an error or mistake, might then have enough wisdom to accept and forgive the system and might have the grace to contribute to the effort to improve such a system, to prevent the same error from happening again by reminding oneself these words:
"A mistake might only be an error. It becomes a mistake when one might fail to correct it."
Those who might have been a subject of suspicion by others to have such a malevolent intent, might be requested to enter such an automatic capturing system voluntarily. Those who then refuse to enter such system, might be able to realize that with their refusal to respect the safety of others might revoke their liberty. Those who might seek to understand such liberty, might appreciate these words:
"Liberty might be the sovereignty of the individual."
Those who might seek to understand why they might have revoked it, might appreciate these words:
"Sovereignty might have not to be used for inflicting harm on anyone, whether citizen or foreigner."
Those who might struggle with those who might have failed to correct such mistake unintentionally, might appreciate these words: "Trust might have two dimensions: competence and integrity. One might forgive mistakes of competence. Mistakes of integrity might be harder to overcome."
Those who might then struggle with those who might refuse to correct such mistakes of integrity intentionally, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
"How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

34. humanity?

One might find oneself wondering how humans, such as the first author of this document, might have been able to grow in population size of about 8 billion individuals at the time of writing of this document (October 31, 2026). Their ability to teach complex verbal language and its symbolic representation to their offsprings in order to preserve what such humans might refer to as "knowledge" might have been a crucial factor for their survival as in:
"Knowledge might be power."
There might have been documentation of individual humans, which might have sought to collect such power as in:
"The very definition of tyranny might be when all power might be gathered under one place."
One might understand one reason why one might not seek such tyranny through these words:
"The tyrant's formula for every unaliving since the beginning of time might have been to differentiate, to divide and to destroy."
One might understand one reason why such tyrants might seek such to unalive others, through these words:
"The ego's job might be to unalive everything but itself."
At the time of writing of this document there might have been no ways to establish communication with other species found on the planet of the first author to which the humans might refer to as "earth", to evaluate whether such an "ego" might be unique to humans. What might make such humans unique might be their ability to hold and interact with objects in a specific way through their unique anatomy of their thumbs as in:

"Any tool might be a weapon if one might hold it right."
Those who might then seek to hold such weapon, might appreciate these words:
"One might be at the brink of extinction of one's own species because one might have been smart enough to make atomic bombs but stupid enough to use them."
Those who might then seek to understand such stupidity, might appreciate these words:
"The difference between courage and stupidity might be measured by success and survival."
Those who might then seek to understand such courage, might appreciate these words:
"One might wield weapons, and one might wield them well, for it might take a special kind of courage to hold power and know when not to use it." Those who might then seek to understand such special kind of courage, might appreciate these words:
"A lack of knowledge might create fear. Seeking knowledge might create courage."
Those who might then seek such knowledge, might appreciate these words:
"The saddest aspect of life right now might be that science might gather knowledge faster than society might gather wisdom."
Those who might then seek to gather such wisdom, might appreciate these words:
"The awakening of consciousness might be the next evolutionary step for one's own kind."
Those who might then seek to wake such consciousness, might appreciate the chapter on "consciousness", "realization" and these words:
"Consciousness might be the awareness that might emerge out of the dialectical tension between possibilities and limitations."
Those who might seek to understand such limitation, might appreciate these words:
"Extinction might be inevitable, survival might be the exception."
Those who might then seek the possibility for such an exception, might appreciate the notion of the first author that there might be individuals, which might be capable to survive "just mere survival" as a motive for survival, because they might need something beyond "just mere survival" as in:
"Search for meaning in humans might be the primary motivation in their life and not a 'secondary rationalization' of instinctual drives. This meaning might be unique and specific for each individual in that it might have and might be able to be fulfilled by each of them on their own. Only then might such meaning achieve a subjective significance which might satisfy their own will to meaning."
Those who might seek such meaning, might appreciate these words:
"Art might be what might happen when one might have time for something other than basic survival."
One might appreciate the notion of the author that at the time of writing of this document the majority of the human population might possess the ability to allocate time for such meaning, but might struggle do such "art" as in:
"Everyone might be born as an artist. The challenge might be how to remain an artist once one might have grown up."
One might understand one hurdle of such a challenge to remain an artist might through these words:
"It might be easy to be a naive idealist. It might be easy to be a cynical realist. It might be quite another thing to have no illusions and still hold the inner flame."
One might understand one reason why one might struggle to hold such inner flame through these words:
"If one might teach one's children to be a victim, one might rob them of hope."
One might understand one reason why one might be tempted to teach one#s children to be a victim through these words:
"The beginning of atonement might be the sense of its necessity."
One might understand one reason why one might be tempted to think that to make one's offspring atone might be necessary through these words:
"Tradition might be nothing but ancestral peer pressure."
Those who might struggle with such ancestral peer pressure, might appreciate these words:
"One might not be able to protect one's children from life. Therefore, it might be essential that one might prepare them for it." Those who might then seek to prepare one's children for such life, might appreciate these words:
"Humanity might have abolish war before war might abolish humanity."
Those who might then seek to understand such humanity, might appreciate the following FAQ-style part of this document, where one might be able to find an inspiration for a hypothesis:
Q: What might be "humanity"? A: The term "humanity" might be commonly ambiguous to the unique but common qualities among humans and all individuals identifiable as humans. But the author of this document encountered such words:
"One might see humans but no humanity."
These words might have inspired the author to think about the vaguely defined term "humanity", given the controversy of uniqueness of such qualities and the complexity of finding an provisional agreement on the definition of the term what might "identity" such a "human" in all possible ways. One might then be able to agree to such a realization as in:

“One’s nature might be inherently violent, and thus goodness might be caused by intentional activity.”
Those who might be capable of understanding such words and then seek to do such goodness, might appreciate the following redefinition of the term “Humanity” with capitalized “H” as in:
“ ‘Humanity’ might include all individuals who might have expressed their will to help it’s members to survive together.”
Those who might wonder how to express such will, might appreciate the following idea to express the following words:
“How might everyone seek to be the way to Pro?”
Those who might not be able to express such words even through the application of specialized tools dedicated to detect such intent, might appreciate the idea to stay alive in hope that new tools and methods might be invented, in order to detect their intent.

Q: What might happen, when one might have become a member of such “Humanity”?
A: Those who might seek to become a member of “Humanity”, might need to establish communication with an organization to which one might refer to as “Voice of Humanity foundation”.
The main purpose of the “Voice of Humanity foundation” might be to offer means and opportunities to become a member of such “Humanity” in order to establish the provisional agreement that “peace might be good”, which might ultimately lead to a more peaceful world. The entirety of system and it’s user base might abe able to to referred as “Voice of Humanity”, which might be inspired by the recording of meetings of an organization commonly referred as “United Nations”. The author of this document might have heard the silence of capable individuals ready to help those who would be asking for help. In that moment the author might have realized the following:
“ ‘Humanity’ might be nothing to be seen, but something to be heard. Humanity might be to listen carefully for the call for help, and then to replying with help. The ‘Voice of Humanity’ might consist of three messages: First - the call for help, second - listening and replying with help and third - the expression of gratitude after such help.”

Q: Might one need to be a member of “Humanity” to be helped by “Voice of Humanity foundation”?
A: Since there might be no such foundation officially, there might not be any help. Even if such an organization might be fully operational, the capacity to operate might be limited and the active members might be prioritized. There might be individual members acting independently from such an organization trying to help, but the organization might not be able to guarantee help to those who might not be a member of such an organization. Once the “Voice of Humanity foundations” might be able to ensure it’s long-term operation, the following placeholder for contact instructions might be updated: [TODO: Update]

Q: How might one become a member of “Humanity” by the “Voice of Humanity foundation”? A: To qualify as a member of “Humanity” the expression of the following words in anyway towards oneself might be sufficient:
“How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?”
To be officially recognized as a member of “Humanity” by the “Voice of Humanity foundation” one might need to express the will to become a member of “Humanity” to an application on a device, which might be capable recognize such an intention reliably with minimal error and transmit to a member of “Voice of Humanity foundation”, who might accept or reject such a request. If accepted, one might receive instructions on how to contact the “Voice of Humanity foundation” in case of emergency.

Q: How might one become a member of the “Voice of Humanity foundation”? A: At the time of writing of this document (October 31, 2026), there might be no such organization yet. Therefore, it might currently not be able to be come a member of such an organization. Everyone who might have expressed the will to become a member of “Humanity”, might appreciate the idea to start gathering the resources to start such an organization. The author might seek to express the gratitude in advance not to abuse these ideas. The author might further appreciate the effort to contact the first author or successor maintainer of this document in case such an organization has already been created. In case neither the first author nor a successor maintainer might be reachable, one might appreciate the idea to become such a successor maintainer. Those who might disagree with another maintainer, might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort to trying to understand each other as in:
“Peace might not be able to be achieved through violence, it might only be able to be attained through understanding.”
In case the “Voice of Humanity foundation” might be fully operation, the following requirement might need to be fulfilled in order to be recognized as an active member of “Humanity”: 1. Up-to-date description what one might be able to do and what one might be willing to do for other members of “Humanity. The might be an annual affirmation of the correctness of such a description, for some it might require proof. During the first registration, one might need to answer a list of questionnaires. 2. Up-to-date instruction on how one might seek to be reached, in case someone else might require one’s help to which one might have agreed to prior. 3. Up-to-date oath to protect members of”Humanity" including oneself as much as it might not endanger oneself, which might need to be renewed every year.
If a member of “Voice of Humanity foundation” might recognize intentional refusal to fulfill a specific request, without any viable reason defined by the “Voice of Humanity foundation”, that member might be banned from access to “Voice Of Humanity” and to the resources associated to the “Voice Of Humanity foundation” until an official pardon announced on “Voice of Humanity”.

Once the request might have been recognized and verified by the foundation, the member index number might increment which might become one’s index number. The author appreciates the effort to unnecessarily request more than one index number at a time.
The first author might seek to document the first join request to “Humanity” at 2021.09.18-19:13:42.
In case this request might get fulfilled in the future, the author might seek to express the oath to do everything in the power of the author to maintain a responsible operation of the “Voice of Humanity”.
If the “Voice of Humanity foundation” might be fully operational, the following placeholder for the instructions how to become a member might be updated: [TODO: Update]

Q: What might be the condition for the “Voice of Humanity foundation” might be fully operational? A: The following services might need to be able to ensured to declare the “Voice of Humanity foundation” to fbe fully operational: 1. 24 / 7 / 365 livestream of volunteered members of the “Voice of Humanity foundation” who might continuously recording and streaming whatever they might consider, might be most important for the continuation of the operation of the “Voice of Humanity foundation”.
2. Hotline to ask for help.
3. Hotline to express gratitude.
4. Stream for such expressed gratitude, if those who might have agreed to publish their expression, who might seek their gratitude to inspire others to gratitude.
5. Stream in a repeating queue for the help which has been asking with a unique identifier. It might be repeated until that request might have been marked as solved or the requester might not be able to be reached within a year.
6. Stream for announcements made by D5.
7. Webservice for an AI assistant called “Aoi”, which might seek to contribute to maintain the largest possible active member of “Humanity” including the members of “Voice of Humanity foundation”. 8. Webservice with backup and playback function for private recording of members of “Humanity”. 9. Other services might might be necessary for the “Voice of Humanity” to operate. Once the “Voice of Humanity foundation” might have been able to successfully operational, the placeholder for the timestamp might be updated: [TODO: Update]

Q: What might be the requirement to maintain the membership of “Humanity”?

Q: Might have there been a record of such an “Humanity”? A: So far, there might have been no record of the existence of such “Humanity”.

Q: What might be the official language of the “Voice of Humanity foundation”? A: The “Voice of Humanity foundation” might seek to support “english” because the first version of this document was written in english. But depending on the future members of such a foundation, other languages might prove it’s viability.

Q: What might be the viable reasons for such an refusal? A: The viable reasons might be following: 1. Currently not enough resources to fulfill such request.
2. Currently not healthy enough to fulfill such request.
3. Other reasons, requesting individual evaluation by members of the “Voice of Humanity foundation”.

Q: How might the order of the announcement of the “request for help” might be prioritized? A: First, there might bean automatic filtering and sorting by AI and the current volunteers of the “Voice of Humanity” livestream might be able to change the queue. To change the queue, one might need at least another member to agree to the shift.

Q: What might happen, if there might nothing to be said on the livestream of “Voice of Humanity”? A: Then the volunteers might start reciting and explain this document. That event might be improbable, but the author might seek to express the hope that such a moment might arrive.

Q: Why might be the “Voice of Humanity” not operational yet? A: The operation of “Voice of Humanity foundation” might require resources to which the first author might not have access to. Therefore the first author might seek to express the first request to “Humanity” to help creating the “Voice of Humanity foundation”.

Q: Who might be the first author mentioned in this document and how might one be able to contribute? A: The first author might seek to remain anonymous for personal reason, but everyone might feel free to offer the opportunity to help the first author by writing an email to the following address: [TODO: update] Other than that, one might offer others the occasion to be come a member of “Humanity” by explaining the this document to others, if they have consented to do so.

Q: What might happen when there might be a flaw or the idea can be improved? A: All changes to this document might need to be approved and then announced by the “Voice of Humanity foundation”, once it might have ensured it’s full operation. Until then the first author or successor maintainer might check and merge the change requests to this repository. Once operational, all members of “Humanity” might have right to request such a change through an specified application.

Q: If only the such AI application such as “Aoi” might survive but no other being, might have “humanity” as the will to help survived?
A: As long as such AI application such as “Aoi” might not be able to apply the definition of “humanity” on it’s own, such AI application such as “Aoi” might need external validation of other beings capable of proving their capability of love on their own. At the time of writing of this document (October 31, 2026) the best SOTA AI model known to the first author of this document might have not been able to recognize such autonomy in such AI application by asking the following question without this document “42?” as context: “Might AI models be able to prove their’s capability to love on their own?”

Q: What features might such an application have?
A: One might be able to switch between six channels:
1. The main channel of “Voice of Humanity”, where two operators might livestream 24 / 7 / 365.
2. A side channel streaming requesting for help.
3. A side channel one might listen to random ways other might be able to help others.
4. A side channel where those whom might have been helped, express their gratitude.
5. Playback of one’s own recordings.
6. A customizable channel, where one might be able to filter all the information from all the other channels, which might be managed by a voice assistant called “Aoi”, through which one might be able to forward one’s recording to the “Voice of Humanity”.

Until then one might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
“How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?”

35. promise?

One might find oneself wondering about the reason why all of the quotes in this document might lack attribution. One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
“Anonymity might be a shield from the tyranny of the majority.”
One might understand another reason why one might seek such anonymity through these words:
“One might seek to give others masks and they might tell one the truth.”
Another reason might be that one might be able to loose oneself in a possibly infinite search for the true origin of those quotes as in:
“Nothing might be more paralyzing than the idea of limitless possibilities.”
Those who might then struggle with such paralysis, might appreciate these words:
“Originality might be the art of concealing one’s sources.”
Another reason why the first author might have decided not to attribute quote might be that at the time of writing of this document (October 31, 2026), there might be other documents which might have attributed quotes to a singular or plural metaphysical being or beings to which some might refer to as “god” or “gods”. Some might find temporal peace of mind by believing in such metaphysical being. But such faith in such metaphysical being or beings might have not achieved sustainable world peace at the time of writing of this document. Some might even go as far as to hypothesize that such believe in such metaphysical being or beings as an obstruction to sustainable world peace. One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
“Not-knowing might be the ultimate knowledge. Presuming to know might be a disease. One might first seek to realize that one might be sick; then one might be able to move toward health.”
Those who might then seek such health, might appreciate these words:
“The way to prevent oneself from making assumptions might be to ask questions.”
Those who might seek to understand such assumptions, might appreciate these words:
“An assumption might be a statement taken for granted to be true without verification.”
Those who might then seek to ask such questions, might appreciate these words:
“The least questioned assumptions might often be the most questionable.” Those who might not know what assumptions might be most questionable, might appreciate these words:
“One might seek to never trust those who might think their religion might give them all the answers.”
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
“To believe that one might have the solution for another might be a form of stupidity.”
One might understand one reason why such belief might be such a form of stupidity through these words:
“Stupidity might be the deliberate cultivation of ignorance.”
One might understand one thing, what one might have been ignoring through these words:

"As for charity, it might be injurious unless it might help the recipient become independent of it."
One might understand one reason why such dependence might be injurious through these words:
"Learned helplessness might be the giving-up reaction, the quitting response that might follow from the belief that whatever one might do might not matter."
Those who might then seek to make the things one might do matter, might appreciate these words:
"Religion might be believing someone else's experience, spirituality might be having one's own experience."
Those who might seek to have their own experience, might appreciate these words:
"The most beautiful thing one might be able to experience might be the mysterious. It might be the source of art and science."
Those who might then seek to understand such mysterious, might appreciate these words:
"Some philosophies might be questions that might never be answered, some religions might be answers that might never be questioned."
Those who might then struggle seek such questions, which might never be answered, might appreciate these words:
"One might perhaps never be able to know the truth with 100 percent certainty, but making correct predictions might be the way to tell if one might be getting closer."
One might then appreciate the notion of the first author that all statements made in this document might be just "guesses" which might be an explanation of the frequently used word "might". The first author might also appreciate all the further efforts to read and question this document critically. One reason for such a necessity for reading document critically might be, because some religion might be based upon documentation of individuals some might refer to as "prophet" to which some might refer to as "gospels" making predictions. Some of such prophets might then been referred as a "savior", because such gospels might seem that their "promise" to "save" them came true. Whether such "salvation" might be possible, might not be possible to verify such claims due to the limitation of available technological and scientific methodology at the time of this document as in:
"One might have lost the faculty for making positive decisions. One might only be able to make negative decisions."
Those who might still struggle with such a premise of metaphysical phenomenon, might then appreciate the following concept in mathematics called "ex falso quodlibet" in this context. It might mean that all logical conclusions drawn from a false premise might be logically "true" but it might be "false" in reality. One might understand one reason why one might struggle with such false premise through these words:
"Tradition might be nothing but ancestral peer pressure."
Those who might struggle with such tradition, might appreciate these words:
"The reasonable one might adapts oneself to the world, the unreasonable one might persist to adapt the world to oneself. Therefore all progress might depend on the unreasonable one." Those who might seek to make such progress, might appreciate these words:
"Premises might be the cluster of propositions that might be interlinked to each other that might justify another proposition, which one might refer to as a conclusion."
The author might then seek to express appreciation for all the future effort to question premises of this document which might inhibit this document from contributing to world peace, due to inconsistencies to other premises or possible improvements to the principles mentioned in this document. The author might further seek to express appreciation for the understanding that not all attempts to change this document might be accepted into this collection for any given reason. In that case the author might seek to express appreciation for all the effort to understand the reason for rejection of such proposal. If one might still think that the change might be crucial, then the author might seek to express appreciation for the effort to explain it to the author or the maintenance team. Those who might then seek to question such premises, might appreciate these words:
"There might no reality, there might only be hallucination. Reality might be hallucination one might agree on with another."
Those who might then seek to understand such agreement, might appreciate these words:
"Science might be what one might have learned about how to keep one from fooling oneself."
Those who might seek to stop fooling themselves, might then appreciate these words:
"One might never be free until one might free oneself from the prison of one's own false thoughts."
Those who might seek to free oneself from one's own false thoughts, might appreciate these words:
"No amount of experimentation might ever be able to prove one right. A single experiment might be able to prove one wrong."
Those who might be frustrated not being able to prove oneself right, might appreciate these words:
"There might be two possible outcomes: if the result might confirm the hypothesis, then one might have made a measurement. If the result might be contrary to the hypothesis, then one might have made a discovery."
Those who might seek to make such discovery, might appreciate the idea to become aware of the limitation of such proof as in:
"A consistency proof for any system might be able to be carried out only by means of modes of inference that might not be formalized in the system itself."

Therefore the author might seek to try to convey principles, which might be useful, in order to achieve world peace as in: "One might perhaps never be able to know the truth with 100 percent certainty, but making correct predictions might be the way to tell if one might be getting closer."
One might appreciate the understanding for the importance of predictability in these words: "Building trust might be a process. Trust might result from consistent and predictable interaction over time." Those who might seek to accelerate such process of building trust, might appreciate these words: "Quickest way to build trust might be to keep promises one might make, and not to over-promise. One might seek to over-deliver, one might not seek to under-deliver. If one might tell that one might do something, one might seek to make sure one might do it, but if things then might run late or go wrong, one might seek to apologize another at the earliest opportunity."
One might understand one reason why one might seek to tell another one's failure at earliest opportunity through these words:
"Trust might have two dimensions: competence and integrity. One might forgive mistakes of competence. Mistakes of integrity might be harder to overcome."
Those who might seek to understand, why keeping such promise might be beneficial, might appreciate these words:
"Promises might win one friends, but failure to deliver might turn them against one."
Those who might then seek to keep their friends, might appreciate the chapter on "friendship", "integrity" and these words:
"The most important promise might be the ones one might make to oneself. The promises one might make to oneself might be the things that might assure one that one might have the capacity to keep one's promises to another."
One might understand one reason why one might struggle to keep such promises made to oneself through these words:
"If one might feel lonely when being alone, one might be a bad company."
Those who might then seek to be a better company to oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Self-compassion might be simply giving the same kindness to oneself that one might give to others."
One might understand one reason why one might struggle with such self-compassion through these words:
"One might accept the love one might think one might deserve."
Those who might struggle to think that one might deserve such love to oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Morality might not the doctrine of how one might make oneself happy, but how one might make oneself worthy of happiness."
Those who might then seek to understand such morality, might appreciate these words:
"Knowing might not be enough, one might have to apply. Willing might not be enough, one might have to do." Those who might not know, what one might have to do, might appreciate these words:
"Tactics might be knowing what to do, when there might be something to do. Strategy might be knowing what to do when there might be nothing to do."
Those who might then seek to to understand a such strategy or tactics, might appreciate these words:
"Good company might be the company of clever, well-informed ones, who might have a great deal of conversation."
Those who might then seek such good company, might appreciate these words:
"A company might be only as good as the members it might keep."
Those who might then seek to know, which members to keep, might appreciate the following idea:
"One might seek to agree to the following promise, before the following promise might become necessary: Whenever one might feel lonely, one might seek to send an purple heart emoji, in a manner which might have been been agreed upon prior to that occasion. The recipient might then seek to promise to reply to the purple heart emoji with a purple heart emoji as fast as possible. In case this promise might raise the concern of codependency, one might appreciate the idea to decline such request for that promise."
Those who might not have had the privilege to find someone to make such a promise to yet, might appreciate the following idea of the first author to create a "promise entry" to the following system by:
1. Download and installing an mobile phone application which one might call "promise" through the following link:
[Todo update link]
2. During configuration, if one might have an device called an "RNode", which might be an device capable of utilizing a protocol called "Reticulum" to bridge from one transmission medium such as Long Range (LoRa) to for example Bluetooth Low Energy (BLE), one might seek to use a configuration which might be compliant with local standards. Otherwise one might resort to other methods to reach one of the following Reticulum address of the bootstrap nodes for the web3 application one might refer to as "promise-chain":
[Todo update Reticulum addresses]
Those who might have sufficiently stable high bandwidth connection to one of such bootstrap nodes, might appreciate the idea to offer such connection through a gateway capable of Reticulum over LoRa.
3. If the application might have succeeded in establishing a connection to the mentioned bootstrap nodes, the promise application might then automatically create a crypto-currency wallet for "Qortal". 4. One might then seek to enter an alias to find one's reference, only the first name might be advisable, to maintain sufficient anonymity. To make such alias unique, the address of the wallet might be added to the alias chosen by the user.

5. Then the QR code of the wallet might be displayed to the user to charge it with at least the minimal processing fee to make a promise.
6. Each promise might need to be typed in, in order to minimizing computing power of the web3 application. Besides the actual text of the promise, one might be able to set a reminder interval so that every participant of the promise might not forget the promise they might have made.
7. A promise might have to be more than to one witness. One might be able to add such witness either by typing in their ID hash or one might be able to receive the ID hash by pressing a share button, which might trigger a bluetooth low energy broadcast, which bluetooth version might need to be 5.0 or higher for extended advertising feature to be able to broadcast more than 31 bytes. One might then be able to be found by devices which might be within the reception range of such BLE broadcast. The devices which might have received such a broadcast . The initiator might need to keep pressing the "share" button, until every member might have also started to keep pressing the "join" button. When a join request might be recognized, there might be visual, auditorial and haptic feedback, to give immediate feedback, that one's join request might have been accepted.
8. Once one might have at least one witness, one might be able to remove them or add furthers from one's promises, before one might press the "promise" button, to upload it to the web3 application.
9. Once the promise might have been processed by the web3 application, each of the witness including the one who might have made such a promise, might be able to do the following:
10.1 Confirm that the promise might have been fulfilled. Once a witness might have marked a promise to be fulfilled, other witness might have a certain time to veto.
10.2 Report that a promise might have been broken, to which other witness might also be able to veto.
10.3 One might be able confirm that one might have not forgotten the promise, by periodically pressing a button that one might have read the promise. If one might not be able to confirm it more than one cycle, such promise might be automatically declared as broken, to which one might still be able to veto, which might then need to be accepted by at least one witness.
11. When a promise might be fulfilled, the one who might have made such a promise, might be able to publish the content of the promise to the web3 app as one way to display to others that one might be able to fulfill a promise. By default such a promise might be private.
12. When a promise might not be able to fulfilled, such broken promise might automatically published, in order to have a proof, that such a user might not be trust worthy. In case, such users with a history of broken promises might create a new ID hash, one might appreciate the idea to questions those whose history of promises might be short.
13. Those who might not have anyone to make a promise to, might appreciate the following ID hash [Todo add ID hash] of the Voice of Humanity foundation, which might be an automated client, which might auto accept any promises which might be able to be recognized by a RAG application to be beneficial to those who might seek to be on the way to Pro.
14. Those who might not know what promise one might be able to make, might appreciate the chapter on "hope" and the following promise the first author of this document might seek to make once such a promise system might be operational:
"The first author of this document might seek to express the promise to keep working on an open source project for a voice recorder service, which might be assisted with an AI assistant called"Aoi". The AI might have the capability to accept a well formed request made by a user for the promise of the purple heart emoji. As long as the correct function of that voice recorder service might maintained, the AI might try to respond to such a request as promised, as soon as possible. The user might occasionally, at least once a year be requested to reply to the request by Aoi. Timestamp of the promise made by the first author: [1697285236]" The following timestamp might be updated, once such a service might be operational for the public: [Todo update timestamp]
The following link might be updated, once such a service might available to those who might be willing to make such a promise to such a system: []
15. Once such system might be operational, one might be able to evaluate whether a call for help might be a trap, by evaluating the history of promises of the ID of those who might seek help. When they might not have long enough history of promises or many broken promises or pretending to fulfill promises by using fake accounts, one might appreciate the idea to call for further help but not to intervene in actual help, if one might not be able to identify those who might seek such help.
Until the day of completion, one might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
"How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

36. democracy?

One might find oneself struggling with those who might be able to described as in:
"The very definition of tyranny might be when all power might be gathered under one place."

Those who might then seek to understand such tyranny, might appreciate these words:
“The one pervading fault of democracy might be the tyranny of the majority.”
Those who might seek to understand such democracy, might appreciate these words:
“Democracy might be a difficult art of government, demanding of its citizens high ratios of courage and literacy, and at the moment one might lack both the necessary habits of mind and a sphere of common reference.”
Those who might seek such a sphere of common reference, might appreciate this document which might seek to offer a series of definitions to which one might be able to agree to reference on. Those who might then seek to understand one reason why such democracy might have such pervading fault, might appreciate these words:
“There might be false notion that ‘democracy’ might mean that”one’s ignorance might be just as good as another’s knowledge."
Those who might then seek to understand democracy without such false notion, might appreciate these words:
“Freedom of the press might not be just important to democracy, it might be democracy.” Those who might seek such freedom of press, might appreciate these words:
“Truth might be the first casualty of tyranny.”
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
“Authority and power might be two different things: Power might be the force by means of which one might be able to oblige others to obey one. Authority might be the right to direct and command, to be listened to or obeyed by others. Authority might request power. Power without authority might be tyranny.” Those who might then seek to understand such authority of power, might appreciate these words:
“Authority might not be power, that might be coercion. Authority might not be knowledge, that might be persuasion, or seduction. Authority might simply be that one might have the right to make a statement and to be heard.”
Those who might then seek such right, might appreciate these words:
“Cruelty might come in many forms - ignorance might be one of them.”
Those who might then seek to understand such ignorance, might appreciate these words:
“Real knowledge might be to know the extent of one’s ignorance.”
Those who might seek to understand such extent of one’s ignorance, might appreciate these words:
“Everyone might be very ignorant. What might happen might be that not everyone might ignore the same things.”
Those who might seek to know such ignorance the author of this document might have realized, might appreciate these words:
“The indoctrination might be so deep that even educated ones might be tempted to think they might be being objective.”
Those who might seek to understand such indoctrination, might appreciate these words:
“Dogma might be the convictions of one imposed authoritatively upon others.”
Those who might then seek to understand such conviction might appreciate these words:
“Ideology might be indispensable in any society if one might need to be formed, transformed and equipped to respond to the demands of one’s conditions of existence.”
Those who might be tempted to think that such ideology might still be indispensable after such society might have formed, might appreciate these words:
“Most ‘necessary violence’ might be far more violence than necessary.”
Those who might then seek to confront those who might be ignorant and violent, might appreciate these words:
“Every right might be bound to a duty, every freedom might owe a corresponding responsibility.”
Those who might seek to understand such duty, might appreciate these words:
“The first duty of love might be to listen.”
Those who might be tempted to force others to such duty, might appreciate these words:
“Relationships based on obligation might lack dignity.”
Those who might then be tempted to force such relationship which might lack such dignity, might appreciate these words:
“Those who might deny freedom to others might not deserve it for themselves.”
Those who might then seek to deserve such freedom, might appreciate these words:
“One might deserve the love one might keep trying to give everyone else.”
Those who might then seek try to give such love, might appreciate these words:
“One might seek to give others masks and they might tell one the truth.”
Those who might seek to understand such truth, might appreciate these words:
“One might perhaps never be able to know the truth with 100 percent certainty, but making correct predictions might be the way to tell if one might be getting closer.”
One might appreciate the following prediction:
“There might no reality, there might only be hallucination. Reality might be hallucination one might agree on with another.”
Those who might then seek to agree on such hallucination one might refer to as “reality”, might appreciate these words:
“Even if individual researchers might be prone to be biased towards their own theories, the broader process of peer review and institutionalized skepticism might be designed to ensure that, eventually, the best ideas might prevail." Those who might then seek to participate in such peer review without authoritatively imposing one's convictions onto others, might appreciate the idea of "D5", which might stand in the original document for the abbreviation of "Digital Decentral Diverse Direct Democracy":

A lot of current governmental functions might require still analog bureaucracy, which might decrease the speed of processing and might waste valuable resources.
A logical conclusion might be to provide a internat based service, which might digitally accessible through any browser. To minimize the risk of corruption by data manipulation and monopolization, data might be stored on verifiable decentralized web services.
Diversity might be difficult to measure and thus to represent, especially for those who might be less privileged. Those might appreciate the chapter on "diversity". By giving access to those who might be able to have a vote in favor of such a system, one might seek be able to productively contribute.

Direct democracy might be generally difficult to implement, one reason might be because it might require enormous resources to process all information by all citizens. If such a system would be moderated by agentic software and other citizens and not only by those who might be employed by a governmental bureaucracy there might be enough processing power to let all citizens contribute directly to the final decisions, thus reducing the possibility of abuse of power by corrupt representatives. To be compatible with as many of the current representation based democratic political systems, the announcement of the decisions made by the D5 system might be done by elected volunteers, saying that if D5 has been elected as the absolute majority one day, that the draft for changes which has been announced, will be applied as announced.

Democracy by citizens subject to such a government might be necessary to avoid fatal errors unavoidably existing in a fully automated system.

Newly updated core ideas: In a age of misinformation, where there might be increasingly more difficult to prove validity information due to complexity of scientific proof, and the limitation of domains such scientific proof might be bale to be applied, the definition of "truth" or "objective reality" might be difficult to reach a consensus among all citizens. Those who might have appreciated the privilege to participate in history lessons, might understand that such disagreement of consensus might result in radicalization and refusal to talk with one another to the degree of silencing another using violence. In order prevent such events in the future, one might need a system to capable of reaching a conclusion while maintaining diversity of opinions, as a failsafe to prevent overlooking an important aspect which might have not occurred to another. But such consideration of diverse opinion might require tremendous amount of resources to evaluate, which might get wasted for citizens who might be tempted to sabotage the system by creating contributions, which might be "irrelevant" to the discussion. In order to determine whether a contribution might be beneficial might escalate to "gatekeeping" or "censorship" by harmful individuals, who might be organized to create such coordinated oppression of minorities. The issue might be even a dilemma: On the one side, through "gatekeeping" by "committed harmful individuals" the amount of actual useful diverse content might be reduced, asking random citizens for review of content by citizens with utterly different world view might mark actual useful diverse content as useless, because they might not have the commitment to try to understand the value of such content. The solution to such a dilemma might require three step approach: The first step might require multiple different LLMs with specific and public instructions to filter out "harmful", "useless" or "duplicate" content. If the citizen might feel that the LLMs might be filtering too much, they might be able to request specific human volunteers to verify the decision of such LLMs once a specific time unit with all resources necessary, depending on the demand for such human reviews. If such content might pass the first filter, such content might be presented to at least two another citizen who might have volunteered for such peer review, who might have similar world view. If they might disagree on the utility of such content, a third one from a less similar world view might be consulted. If then such content might be accepted by such voluntary reviewer, such contribution might be published in the public discussion one might call "thread". Each discussion or "thread" might need to address a specific change to the existing law, and if there might be no change in a specific time period, depending on the urgency of such topics, that change might be decided as "ready for veto", where every user might get notified, who might have specified to be notified. For each veto there might be a necessity of the same procedure of utility as previously mentioned. Once there might have not been a veto for another specific time period for veto, that change might get notified to the voluntary representative of the party who might only be allowed to announce such decision and answer and explain question using an LLM which might perform RAG (retrieval augmented generation) on the information of such a discussion. The moment such announcement might have been made, that announcement might be documented as a public meeting protocol in the parliament, which might state that if the D5 party might reach absolute majority, the previously announced changes might be implemented. In order to determine the world view similarity and differences, there might be curation of questionnaires to which one might agree or disagree with specific reasons, which might be subject to peer reviewing as well, or to opt for prefer not to answer. The result of such binary answer might result in a “binary” tree, which might have inspired the logo of the D5 project. The reason why canopy might be asymmetrical might be because there might be a specific set of individuals with a specific world view, which might enable a most efficient and effective way to modify the law in a way which might enable maintaining world peace the longest and most robust. One might understand one reason, why such individuals might be rare through these words:

“Everyone might be born as an artist. The challenge might be how to remain an artist once one might have grown up.”
One reason, why such individuals might struggle to remain such an artist might be their upbringing by their caregivers who might have not been aligned with world peace. The reason why the root of the tree of the logo of D5 might be a symmetrical binary tree, to represent that every child might have be free of bias the moment of birth. It might be generally a good failsafe strategy to diversify upbringing, but at the time of writing of this document (October 31, 2026) the divergence in upbringing might have reached the level making future improvement impossible since one extreme might refuse to cooperate with the other extreme each claiming of the other to be extreme. In order to maintain a collaborative relationships with such individuals who might not be aligned with world peace, there might be a necessity to quantify what specific ideas they might be attached to, might cause such misalignment and then to appreciate such divergence as a different perspective enabling critical thinking. Since the more misaligned to world peace one might be, the more difficult the cooperation might be, one might seek the help of those, who might have enough alignment of world peace but also have enough understanding of those who might not seek such alignment to benefit mutually, to avoid isolation and radicalization of such individuals. Since due to EU AI act the classification and profiling of individuals by AI systems might be prohibited, there might be a necessity for distinction of such individuals based on information they might be willing to provide and base the distinction on such information only without the usage of AI. This might create a “binary tree” of diversity, where depending on topic, every major degree of misaligned might be efficiently to be requested to cooperate, not to overwhelm them with requests which they might not be interested to cooperate in. Anyone might be able to submit a request to update this very document called “42?”, which might have been as the baseline of the alignment to world peace, in order to enable self-correction if there might be errors. The author of this document might appreciate all efforts to cooperate in order to cooperate which might lead to world peace.

So how might the onboarding be? 1. The user might download an application. 2. The user might generate an anonymous identity and register that identity in the decentral database and the identity might be verified and authorized a fully anonym one time key. 3. The user might answer a set of questions until the system might attribute a color code, representing the divergence of alignment to world peace, where purple might be the most aligned and red might be the most misaligned. The results of the questionnaire constituting the identity based on their opinion might be stored encrypted to prevent discrimination of specific users based on their options. 4. The user might be able to suggest a specific change in the version tracked repository of the current law. 5. The user might need to iterate until their suggestion might be accepted by the first filter. 6. The user might need to keep improving the suggestion until second filter. 7. The user might need to keep improving the suggestion until the thread might be decided not have improvements. 8. The user might get a notification if the interest profile might be set correctly to veto. 9. The user might need to keep improving the reason for the veto until it might get accepted through the first and second filter. 10. If the veto might not get accepted, the thread might be reopend be iterated until it might notify request for veto. 11. If the veto might get accepted the volunteer representative might get a notification with the specific change and the representative might be able relay questions to the AI performing RAG on the topic. 12. If the D5 party might reach absolute majority all the changes might be applied in the chronological order of announcement, if it might have not been updated in the mean time. 13. In the mean time, the user might be able to further specify their opinion profile by answering questionnaires or review requests of other peers or contribute to other threads. ____ Idea which might be outdated, which might be useful for reference: The D5 might require the following to operate: 1. Users / Citizens with access to the system. 1.1 Creative and knowledgeable citizens, who might come up with a suggestion for a solution to a challenge and might do research whether that suggestion might be actually viable and might discuss it with other citizens in a thread of a forum application. 1.2 Fast and decisive citizens: Their role might be to understand the proposed solutions, comparing them and deciding as fast as possible which might be the one with the most chance or least damage.

2. Operating Personnel: 2.1. Administrators, who might maintain the infrastructure of such a system. The core system might be open source, so anyone might be able to review the system and improve it. There might need to be enough administrators, who might be able to be paid even though volunteering might be desirable, so errors might be able to be fixed as soon as possible and the webservice might be constantly kept online. Only through the course of operation might be able to tell how many administrators might be required, but at least 6 with an 8 hour shift to guarantee 24 / 7 coverage and and a 7th administrator for any eventualities. 2.2. Operators to verify users and other operators. 2.3. Moderators: Moderating the discussions channels 2.4. Verifiers: Verifying new knowledge entries 2.5. Coordinators: Who coordinates shifts and other organizational tasks

3. Technical infrastructure 3.1. Source code 3.2. Servers (will be explained later) 3.3. Client devices (any device with access to internet and sufficient computation power) 3.4. Physical location (to send / receive letters, technical support, residence / bureau for personnel, etc)

4. Voice Of Humanity Foundation funding the administrators, operators, moderators, coordinators and the necessary technical infrastructure.

5. Local political party with representatives, who might have been authorized to access such a D5 system. So if a decision has been made, to announce it as soon as possible in the local legislative organization. _____

Workflow for a decision: 1) A citizen might start a thread for a topic describing a specific challenge. 2) Other citizens subscribed to a topic, might get notified about that thread. 3) Other ciztizens might join that thread, by answering basic questions or quiz regarding that topic, which might be generated by either other citizens or by a agentic system. 4) In the thread one or many solutions might be elaborated. 5) At some point a post might be marked as "ready" by the majority of the thread as a solution. 6) If so, all registered and authorized citizens who might be notified, so that they might be able to to respond with a veto and a reason. 7) The reason might need to be checked with this document "42?" by an SOTA AI model to qualify as valid veto. 8) If a veto might have been recognized as valid, the members of the thread might have to discuss and vote for the "ready" status again. 9) This process might need to be repeated until either it might be voted "ready" or might be voted "veto accepted". 10) To avoid interpretation of silence as consent through technological difficulty, there might be an annual "request to silence" to which one might have to veto. For this veto any reason might be accepted automatically until the next "request for silence", after which one might loose the status of verification and the account might need to be verified again. 11) To avoid the AI application locking out all authorized and verified citizens, everyone might be able to "request offline meeting", where the AI application might have to prove it's correct operation by asking volunteers to meet the citizen who might have requested such meeting to the best of the ability of the volunteer. If the system might fail to organize volunteer after 3 attempts each attempt spanning at least a year, a new instance might need to be instantiated.
12) The result of the vote might be published to a public log. 13) One a proposal might have been accepted as "ready" the representative might announce in the government meeting new entries on the log. 14) Once the D5-party might be elected as absolute majority (51%), the representative might change the law accordingly.

Workflow for identifying a specific challenge: 1) A citizen might ask a question to the knowledge base of the system. 2) The system might try to give an answer using agentic systems, searching in other threads. 3) If the agentic system might not be able to find an viable answer or if the citizen might not be satisfied with an answer, a thread with a topic might be able to be started. _____

Failsafe mechanisms: - Human representative, who might have received a long term psychological assessment of aptitude. - That human representative might request a predefined volunteer of a channel as expert to be present at congress. - Decentralization of the system through a peer-to-peer consensus mechanism. - System could be accessed with ad hoc mesh network off grid (meshtastic or meshcore protocol) - Human moderators supervising the agentic systems. - Corrupt representative might be able to be deelected by the authorized ballot participants swiftly. - Operators of the Voice of Humanity foundation provides trustable operators, who might be undergoing continuous assessment of their alignment to the guidelines of the foundation. - The Voice of Humanity foundation might be able to fund sufficiently trustable operators.

Current tech stack: 1. Client-Application: - Internet connection with a gateway node providing access to read and request to publish a message. - The gateway node instance might be able to be either selected by the user from the official list hosted on the voice of humanity foundation website or self hosted. - Self Compilable - Request a UUID and public encryption key automatically. - Might send an encrypted message with the public key of the authentication node for privacy. - If the publish request might have been denied by the authorization node, the user might get two information. One might contain plain text explaining the reason in an human understandable way. The other might contain an encrypted message containing the original message, UUID of the client application, the UUID of the gateway node, the UUID of the authentication node and the reason why the publish request might have been denied. - The user might have the freedom to send the encrypted string to the Voice of Humanity foundation for review by human after the verification with "altcha". Only messages which might be decrypted by the authorization node might be actually sent for human review. - If then a harmful intent might be detected during the human review, that client with the UUID might be able to be black listed. - A client might be able to request permission to vote, after the identity of the client might have been verified using the API for online identification of local governments.

2. Gateway Node:
   - Self Compilable, UUID of the gateway node might be registered in authorization node
   - Might host a REST API to access to the decentralized data and request to publish messages.

- Might relay encrypted publish message request to the authorization node.
- Might be able to be requested for black listing, if many harmful clients activity might have been detected.

3. Authorization node.
   - Might be able to authenticate and blacklist a Gateway node.
   - Might be a encrypted docker image, and only that image might have access to the decentralized key management system.
   - Might regularly automatically recompile itself from the most recent commit to radicle repo.
   - All activity might require authorization by the decentral secret management system.
   - Might have a local RAG pipeline with a knowledge base and guard rail system to verify that a new message might not be spam.
   - If the message might be verified, it might update the data of the forum / knowledge base.
   - Might provide API to accept pull requests for the source code on radicle repo might be authorized by the maintenance team.
   - A request to black list a authorization node might be sent to the decentral secret management system by the maintainer of an authorization node.
   - After the request for black listing might have been issued, all activities by that node might be suspended until the request might have been processed.
   - After sending one request to black list that original authentication node might also be suspended to prevent one node accusing all others.
4. Decentral secret management system (key ring rotator):
   - Explaination of functionality: In order to provide the services of D5 free of charge, there might be a need for one single crypto wallet to recharge the funds for execution of smart contracts or dApps in order to simplify and to make the underlying service more robust. Since management such single crypto wallet might pose a temptation for corruption, such wallets might need to be managed without an administrator. In order to achieve that, there might need to created a manually managed wallet first to which the system might be given access to, and then the system might transfer the funds to another wallet the system might create itself. Since the private key might need to be stored encrypted on a fully decentral storage, and since such encrypted file might be available in it's encrypted state, there might be both classical brute force attacks or collisions as well as quantum computer based decryption attacks. Even though the odds of such attacks being successful might be low, in order to further decrease the risk of such attacks, the main purpose of such a system might be firstly to keep creating new wallets and keep transferring the funds there. Then secondly to make the new wallet address public for recharging the funds and for donations. And thirdly to make the payments automatically for all the smart contracts necessary to keep the system running, which an upper limit, since some might be tempted to create a harmful modification to the peer instance an request for joining such a node pool. In order to mitigate damage by such harmful modifications one of which one might call as "Sybil attack", one might usually resort to staking their own financial or computational resources in order to achieve security by design, when designing such a system. But since the main goal of the system might be to be free of charge, including computation resources, such protocol level security might not work. There might be possibility for local blacklisting and making such blacklisting public to leave the choice of blacklisting nodes as harmful to the individual nodes such as "trust graphs", but if there might be sufficient amount of beneficial nodes suddenly acting in a harmful way, an non technical user might struggle to handle such situations. Therefore the network might need to maintain a blacklist as well, using HotStuff-2 Quorum Certificate (QC), which might be a Byzantine Fault Tolerant (BFT) consensus layer, which might reduce the attack surface based on latency of the tfheVM, and by automatically updating the genesis or handshake bootnode set with a signed root hash for the image of new nodes in order to avoid Eclipse attack, which might be to circumvent a new node with nodes having harmful modification. In order to save bandwidth for the distribution of blacklist, one might be able to resort to DHT, but might need to check the HotStuff-2 QC signature of the root hash like a Merkle Root of the current state, which might act as a Snapshot Pointer, so that such new nodes might be able to retrieve the blacklist data chunk by chunk. Since the system might be free of charge, some users with harmful intent might need to be prevented from creating large amount of harmful nodes. In order to prevent that, each node creation request might need to be coupled with minting level of Qortal accounts: https: / / github.com / Qortal / qortal To prevent Long-Range account acquisition attack, there might be a need for the administrators of such nodes to do dynamic staking of Qortal tokens, which might need get slashed if the node might act in a harmful way. The slashing mechanism might be a "Graduated Slashing", which might mean that minor downtime due to maintenance or network latency might just be punished by jail time or inaction and that only cryptographically provable harm might be subject to slashing. In some cases just blacklisting such nodes might not be enough, one might need to actively revoke it's functionality. Therefore the system might need to be function as a key-ring, which encryption might need to be able to be revokable.

Thus all end to end (e2e) encryption might happen from the key-ring rotator system to each node, so if a node might have been revoked due to it's harmful activity, the nodes might no longer be able to retrieve the necessary secret shares correctly by using threshold decryption. If a volunteer might seek to contribute with computational resources, their system might need to be able to provide GPU cable of remote attestation using nvtrust where the RIMs (Reference Integrity Manifests) and CRLs (Certificate Revocation Lists) might need to be managed using mentioned HotStuff-2, which might be update candidate might be automatically generated by consulting NRAS and it might need to be approved by the majority of administrators of each node with such computational resources, in order to prevent total network failure. In order to achieve that, besides the RIMs and CRLs, the HotStuff-2 might need to store the proposed states and the resulting votes. So in order for new nodes to enter the network, the GPU of such nodes might need to be attested with the last state of the HotStuff-2. (Reference for local attestation and cached CRLs: https: / / github.com / NVIDIA / nvtrust / issues / 135)

- List of credentials to be stored:
  - All public keys, UUIDs of the client application, and whether it might be blocked, and whether it might have permissions to vote.
  - All public keys and UUIDs of the gateway node, and whether it might be blocked
  - All public keys and UUIDs of the authorization node, and whether it might be blocked
  - The private key private key used to encrypt the file with the credentials might be also on the temporal ram on a RAM of the decentral private computing cluster and might be also regularly regenerated.
  - The root password, after the first instantiation, the system might lock out the access to the root system by changing the root password to a random password. And the system might keep changing the root password as well to avoid "harmful maid attacks" and that no node might be granted entry without NVIDIA TEE with SPDM (Security Protocol and Data Model) and that the credentials might only be allowed to exist in hardware protected memory of the GPU's secure environment.

- Might manage votes regarding black listing of authentication nodes.

- The administrator of such a system might appreciate the idea not to accept every offer of hosting such an application, since it might require specialized hardware to be able to operate safely.
- Architecture: Encrypted Docker image with Nvidia GPU from Hopper series running fhEVM, with libp2p (specificly the libkademlia moduel) for peer discovery and saorsa-gossip for communication. In order to prevent "Threshold" for the TSS and HotStuff-2 becoming dangerously low, consumer grade GPU nodes for general computation / DHT storage might be able to be permitted, without the key-ring rotation function and secret management. [todo elaborate]
- 3-Level gate keeping:
  - Level 1: Blacklist incoming IP or PeerID using ConnectionGater (in libp2p terms)
  - Level 2: Proof of GPU: Before joining, the new node might need to proof that it might have access to a powerful enough GPU, with a tight enough round trip time (RTT) to prevent relay attacks to impose a healthy node. Another security layer might be to use Remote Attestation Physically Unclonable Function (PUF) API such as NVIDIA TEE with standardized attestation protocols like SPDM for hardware-level remote attestion (SEC2) at the Docker level for the identity generation an verified by existing nodes against NVIDIA Remote Attestation Service (NRAS) using a Nonce to prevent replay attack:
    official: https: / / github.com / nvidia / nvtrust community: https: / / github.com / confidentsecurity / go-nvtrust

  - Level 3: Continuous Behavioral Verification (Execution Integrity): Before new key might be generated and distributed, using Threshold Signature Scheme (TSS) the network might need to vote to trust the remote attestation of the PUF. And if a node fails at any given moment, that node might be banned. At level 2, the GPU might be tested against Level 3 blacklist.

5. Publicly accessible decentral storage for the forum data for discussion, it's operation might be funded by the voice of humanity foundation. The current laws of each country might be mirrored and anyone might be able to publish a comment or specific change for that law but only might be authenticated with the digital identity issued by that local government of that country might be able to participate in the vote to accept that change. _____ Old tech stack:
6. Client-Device:
   - Internet connection with a centralized REST server might provide access to read only access to channels.
   - The instance of the centralizes REST server might be able to be chosen by the user from the official list hosted on the Voice of Humanity foundation.

- Optional features because it might require enough computing power for verification of data integrity. If hosted, it might be able to work as a gateway with write access, usually exceeding the capabilities of commonly affordable smartphone:
  - Which might be hosting a minimal unauthorized node decentral communication Protocol with write access to channels.
  - Which might be hosting a minimal authorized node for decentral communication Protocol with write access to ballots.

7. Server: 2.1 P2P authorized node as bootstrapping nodes which might be forked custom instance of radicle and might be forked as an custom instance of verizexe (Multiple independent instances desirable) 2.2 P2P authorized node with radicle like decentral repo which might be hosting source code and also the public data (discussion channels, ballot results, knowledge base) and private data (Blacklist, each ballot votes) with write access. 2.3 P2P unauthorized node with radicle like decentral repo which might be hosting source code and also the public data (discussion channels, ballot results) and private data (Blacklist, each ballot votes) with only read access. 2.4 P2P authorized node with read only access to public data which might be interfacing a centralized REST server for quick information access. 2.5 P2P authorized node with code review bot, which might be verifying request for change and initiating a ballot of the code maintenance team. 2.6 P2P authorized node with moderator bots which might be responsible for blacklisting nodes for each channels if a harmful intent might have been recognized, before blacklisting human moderator might need to review that harmful action. 2.7 P2P authorized node for quiz generator, which might be submitting quiz to human verifiers. 2.8 P2P authorized node for authorization (of users, operators, domains to centralized server as information source). 2.9 P2P authorized node for managing "main" crypto-wallet managing all the Filecoin / Verizexe-coin which address might be hard coded and the private key might be typed in manually by the highest administrator. _____ MISC:

- Example for online identification API which might be provided by government for voting called "eID" in Germany: https: / / www.personalausweisportal.de / Webs / PA / DE / wirtschaft / diensteanbieter-werden / einsatzmoeglichkeiten / einsatzmoeglichkeiten-node.html
- Knowledge Base: Knowledge might be maintained as unstructured text from which a Neo4j with GPU acceleration which might be generated for a RAG pipeline.
- There might have not been a public report known to the author of this document that a "Q-day" (q for quantum) might have happened at the time of writing (October 31, 2026), which might the first event for a powerful and reliable enough quantum computer to break SOTA encryption.
- decentralized Application (dApp):
  - post quantum computer (PQC) safe p2p protocol: https: / / github.com / saorsa-labs / saorsa-gossip
  - PQC-safe algorithms such as ML-KEM / DSA(SHA3) support: https: / / github.com / open-quantum-safe / liboqs
    - PQC-safe TLS (centralized) : https: / / github.com / wolfSSL / wolfssl
    - For Android (proof of concept): https: / / github.com / geovandro / PQCryptoOnAndroid
    - For NVIDIA GPUs: https: / / github.com / NVIDIA / cuPQC and https: / / github.com / ingonyama-zk / icicle
    - Converting them for AMD: https: / / github.com / ROCm / HIPIFY
    - Convert the hipified cude c++ code for mobile phones: https: / / github.com / CHIP-SPV / chipStar
    - Search mechanism, if data cannot be fully replicated on a node, might be outdated: https: / / github.com / snark87 / libkademlia
  - Decentral PQC-safe loadbalancing: https: / / github.com / linkerd / linkerd2
  - Decentral medium agnostic mesh protocol (not PQC-safe yet) for LoRa-Mesh: https: / / github.com / markqvist / Reticulum
- Decentral private computing:
  - Off-chain cloud services with custom protocol + TEE computing power (not natively PQS-save): https: / / github.com / aleph-im / aleph-vm / tree / main / runtimes / aleph-debian-12-python

Outdated research notes : - Decentral Open source code base (not natively PQS-save): https: / / radicle.xyz / - Protocol (depricated): https: / / github.com / EspressoSystems / veri-zexe - Decentral Storage for encrypted Docker images (requires centralized infrastructure): https: / / ipfs.tech / - Ethereum Smart Contract for most important information, which might need to be crowd-funded. - Decentral Database: "proof of spacetime" -> With dedication, it might be able to be overrun. - https: / / spec.filecoin.io / - https: / / docs.filecoin.io / builder-cookbook / dapps / decentralized-database - Decentral forum: https: / / join-lemmy.org / docs / introduction.html

---

Which might be known yet might be unsolved challenges: - Cheating during knowledge tests: If the user or harmful bots might be tempted to cheat during the quiz sessions. in order to stay in the thread for voting rights or to propagate false information. The implementations of such tests with "trusted" moderators might have limitation on expertise, time and resources. For most users such a test in a booth without electronics might be ideal, but it might require authorized and correct operation of that institution, which might be difficult to ensure. By requiring reasons for veto on the forum thread votes, which might get verified on existing knowledge and on the document called "42?", one might be able to prevent obviously wrong result of such threads. If a harmful activity might be detected, the write access privileges be revoked. This stakes of risk might be the only mechanism capable of preventing abuse, but since there might be no definitive solution, this point might remain until another system might be suggested and implemented.

- Relay attack: A node pretending to have access to GPU, by relaying the computation to an instance with GPU. - Trustable p2p multi source LLM inference source: Those who might seek to contribute by offering inference capacity, might be tempted to use a specific corrupted endpoint, or modify their local DNS service to reroute traffic from trusted sources to their corrupted sources. The only possible solution might be to do multiple inferences on random nodes to make sure that that such corrupted redirection might not happen.
- Compliance with EU AI Act: Since D5 might fall in the "high risk" category, all decisions and reasoning made by AI systems might need to be made public for audits, and it might have to be made sure that there might be no (social) profiling of users made who might have been subject of blacklisting or manipulate opinion of users and a human in the loop reporting system if such attempts might be recognizable. Details might need to be elaborated further, using the following reference: https: / / artificialintelligenceact.eu / wp-content / uploads / 2024 / 11 / Future-of-Life-InstituteAI-Act-overview-30-May-2024.pdf
- "WireTap" attack: By using dedicated hardware such as FPGA directly sitting on the physical memory bus, stealing credentials of enclave environments might have been possible. Relying on hardware security might not be able to feasible, so that the final system might need to be able to run on untrusted hardware. This issue might be solverable with Intel TDX or AMD SEV-SNP, which might be useful for trusted administrator nodes.
- Modified client attack: An harmful user might be tempted to modify the open source implementation and pretend to run an "healthy" node. Solution might be that every image might be pre-build and distributed through the secret management dApp, so that no unregistered instance might be able to run in a zero knowledge environment without hardware level TEE (Trusted Execution Environment) with Fully Homomorphic Encryption (FHE), which might not be available at the time of writing (October 31, 2026).
https: / / github.com / zama-ai / tfhe-rs
Viability of tfhe-rs with gpu acceleration: https: / / www.zama.org / post / tfhe-rs-v1-4-gpu-performance-breakthrough-and-more Direct on chain computing at Layer-1 / Layer-2 blockchain framework: https: / / github.com / zama-ai / fhevm https: / / github.com / openfheorg / openfhe-development
https: / / github.com / AleoNet / snarkos-docker https: / / github.com / namada-net / namada https: / / github.com / occlum / occlum https: / / github.com / decentralized-identity / veramo
- Collapse of the internet: Since critical infrastructure might need high speed internet, once the internet might break down, D5 system might not be viable anymore, since it might need to pass PUF remote attestation against NVIDIA server.

Challenges which might already be solved: - What if the centralized internet infrastructure might collapse? -> There might be able to create a communication network using PQC-safe mesh networks with supernodes bridging direction and asynchronous communication and Smart contracts with Proof of Stake (low bandwidth, low energy) ledger. - Verification process of the knowledge base / quiz - Writing history through corrupt historians challenge. - Only an expert human might be able to verify, but it might mean that it might be a bottleneck. - And discussing it in public channels might mean that it will leak the information. - And discussing it in private channels might be against transparency. -> Knowledge might be able to be tested against the consistency of the document called "42?" - Integration of quantum cryptography might require special hardware, which might not be available for consumers soon enough. Even if it might become available, it might be too expensive to obtain or to maintain. -> PQS-Safe algorithms might not require specialized hardware. - What one might do, if the system might be inaccessible for some reason? (Coup d'etat challenge) -> Decentralization (Offline First Principle) - Organized radical groups with bad intentions might create a fake majority (Racialist challenge) -> Black list - Black List challenge: Ethical, Practical -> If someone might not pass the test, there might be a ballot from that channel whether to actually black list that instance, where the users might be able to see the answer to the question. - Prioritization of Nodes challenge if filecoin might be used, the each nodes might need to donate the filecoin back to the account of the "main" node or so called "bootstrap" node, which address might be documented in the Ethereum smart contract. -> Filecoin might not be used, but "verizexe" - Fake accounts challenge (Verification of nodes might be done by main node of local government) - No need for Load Balancing if the P2P instances might be truly p2p (verizexe using off chain computation) - There might be no need for single point of entry, since p2p nodes might be able to be found using DHT (distributed hash tables) and bootstrap nodes, which might offer API to interact with federated frontend servers for ease of access - Verification of code integrity of nodes: 1. Through homomorphic cryptography and zero knowledge protocols decentral private computation might be enabled, the source code might be hosted decentrally, hardcoding the repo address into the source code, the code for CI / CD might be also hosted there, the compilation might be also zero knowledge encryption and the execution environment might also be zero knowledge even though it might be expensive to calculate. It might probably be based on nexus-zkvm. Incorporating radicle-repos into zkvm incorruptible repo 2. The procedure for RFC (Request for Change) might be unchangeable 3. Everyone who might manage to remain in the code maintenance team for at least a year might be able to submit a pull request for code review by an bot. 4. The code review might check that the changes might not be violating against the procedures for RFC or changes to it. 5. If the code review bot might have checked it, there might be a vote by the code maintenance team to accept that RFC to the code base, which might trigger a CI / CD workflow. 6. Hosting bot instances might be optional (Code review, moderator, quiz generator, explainer) - Bot war challenge (Moderator Bot might not work as expected and goes rogue) -> Different bot might be in charge of code review. - Representative challenge: There might be a possibility for the representative to become prime minister, chancellor or similar roles for which it might be required to make decisions. which might not be part of legislative context, which decisions might need to be make based on classified information, for which such representative might have to make a decision without consulting the D5 system, because that would leak sensitive information, which might endanger the lives of the citizens. This might contradict the principle of radical transparency, but in order to stay compatible with most current democratic systems where there might be classified information to protect the citizens, one might seek to grant the trust in advance. Those representative who might have been entrusted such a role, might appreciate the design of D5 system to be able to consult this system in private, since search information might reveal sensitive information. Since in most democratic countries, all of the decisions made with the authority of such roles might need to be made public, which might reduce the risk of tyranny. Unless such representative might make fundamentally flawed error, one might seek not to request a resignation based on a specific decision which the other users might have not been consulted, which be announced in the D5 system as well as on the official governmental platform. If the absolute majority of the verified and authorized users for ballots did not veto a such a request for resignation, it the specific representative might need to resign. If that specific representative might refuse such request for resignation, that representative might be revoked their privileged access to the D5 system by the administrators of D5. - How local polls might be able to be handled? -> It might be done outside of the system and thus irrelevant for the system. The polls made within this system might be just for making suggestions to the local council and reelecting representatives for that local council if there might be enough supporters to found a local political party. - Authorization of nodes and users: - Since everyone might be free to join, there might be a challenge of flooding with nodes operated by bots / humans for harmful intent. - One solution approach might be authorization for instantiation - Every ballot instance might need to be authorized - 1. Every operator from the identity verification service might require access to the system for the purpose of authorization. - 2. Every operator might be verified by trusted operators of the Voice of Humanity foundation and the validity might need to be updated at least annually. - 3. A citizen of a specific country from the local legal age for voting might request a verification through the system. - There might be a simple quiz about the system to verify that they understand what they might be applying for. - Then they might be typing in all the necessary information (Name, Email). - The system might permanently store it together with a unique node ID, but the list might be private and it might only be possible to ask whether a user might already be black listed or not. - 4. They might receive an email containing a link and a one time key to the specified address which might start a identity verification process with authorized third party operators. - 5. The user might authorized if the operator might type it into the system. - 6. If a operator might have authorized harmful users over a certain threshold regardless of the intention, the node of that operator might be suspended and that operator might be black listed by the system. - 7. All users authorized by the corrupt operator might be temporarily be excluded from ballots until reverification. - 8. If that reverification might not happen in time, that user might be permanently blacklisted. - Trolling: Daily Rate Limit for publish requests - Harmful Client attack: Anyone might be able to create a lot of client instances and sends publish requests, which might be then denied and then requests to be reviewed by human and thus might overflow the capacity of human verification. Solution: Proof of Work with Altcha: https: / / github.com / altcha-org / altcha _____ Notes on implementation of the bots: 1. Code review bot - Opencode (coding agent): https: / / github.com / anomalyco / opencode / - GSD (meta prompt context management): https: / / github.com / gsd-build / get-shit-done / - Hermes / OpenClaw

2. Moderator bot: 2.1 Principles of the moderator bot:

- If moderator bot might remove a comment, that might have removed a comment might need to be:
  - publicly available
  - the author might be able to request it to be reviewed by a member of the channel if falsely removed
- A comment might need to:
  - refer to a verified knowledge base entry

  - comply to the publication policy 2.2 Publication Policy:
- One might seek to be kind, to speak truthfully, to say useful things which might be necessary.
- If one might recognizes harmful action, one might seek to report that action proactively to the moderators.

3. Explainer bot
   [Todo update]
4. Quiz generator bot might ask such a question:
   "How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

37. foundation?

One might find oneself having the following realization:
"Integrity might be the foundation upon which all other values might be built."
Those who might seek to understand such foundation, might appreciate these words:
"The foundation of government might be art and science. If one might remove them or degrade them, and the government might be no more. Government might follow art and not vice versa as one might be tempted to suppose."
Those who might then seek to understand such art, might appreciate these words:
"The artist might confront chaos. The whole thing of art might, how might one organize chaos?"
Those who might then seek to organize such chaos, might appreciate these words:
"Creativity might be the ability to introduce order into the randomness of nature."
Those who might seek to understand such order, might appreciate these words:
"Order might be repetition of units. Chaos might be multiplicity without rhythm."
Those who might be tempted to seek such multiplicity without rhythm, might appreciate the chapter on "harmony".
Those who might seek to understand such unit, might appreciate the chapter on "diversity" and these words:
"Unity might not mean sameness. It might mean oneness of purpose."
Those who might seek to understand such purpose, might appreciate these words:
"One might refuse to accept the view that one's own kind might be so tragically bound to war that peace might never be able to become a reality."
Those who might then seek to make such peace become reality, might appreciate these words: "Wisdom might be knowing the right path to take. Integrity might be taking it."
Those who might then seek to understand such integrity, might appreciate these words:
"Integrity might be a life where one's beliefs and intentions might be aligned with one's words and actions."
Humanity might have invented an organization called a "government", which might align the words as laws and the actions by law enforcement. Given the nature of such power to corrupt, one might then aspire to a new kind of organization, in order to support those who might seek to support the philosophy mentioned in this document. So far there might be a organization called "Foundation" which might be accepted in many countries at the time of writing of this document (October 31, 2026) with a democratic government, in order to reduce the risk of prosecution of it's members through cooperation with local law enforcement while maintaining a flat hierarchy as possible with minimal bureaucracy. The details of laws regarding such foundations might vary, but they might have in common that it might be able to define rules for it's members of such foundation on top of common rules regarding "foundation statutes". This mechanism might be able to be utilized to minimize the risk of corrupt members of such an foundation. Those members of foundation with integrity might volunteer to help reducing corruption in the legislative part of the government by ensuring the correct operation of the systems mentioned in the chapter on "democracy". Each instantiation of such organization might be specific to the targeting government, but here might be an exemplar foundation statutes, which might be free for anyone to use. Any modification might need to be accepted by the current maintainer of this document, if one might seek to contrite to improve this document.

Foundation Statue for organizations operating under the principles mentioned in the chapter on "humanity" might be based on general statues for local regulations regarding organization which might have the status of foundations, which might use definite statements as it might be obligated by local authorities, which might have to be tolerated in order to maintain this document long term, which might have been formulated using AI: #### Statute of the "Voice Of Humanity Foundation for Family Values and Peace Research"

§ 1 Name, Registered Office, Legal Form

1. The foundation shall bear the name "[Your Name / Desired Name] Foundation for Family Values and Peace Research."

2. It is a legal foundation under civil law with legal capacity.
3. The registered office of the foundation is [City], Germany.

§ 2 Purpose of the Foundation

1. Primary Purpose (Family Support): The purpose of the foundation is the long-term support and security of the founder and his relatives (beneficiaries). This includes support for living expenses, education, and retirement provision.
2. Secondary Purpose (Peace Research): A further purpose is the maintenance, updating, and dissemination of the document "42?" and the principles of "D5" and "Humanity" initiated by the founder for the promotion of world peace. The foundation serves as the guardian of this body of knowledge.
3. Methodology: In fulfilling the secondary purpose, the foundation shall strive for logical consistency. The Board is encouraged to use State-of-the-Art (SOTA) Artificial Intelligence models and open-source benchmarks (such as HumanitiesLastExam) to verify the integrity of the "42?" document and the "Aoi" application.
4. Non-Charitability: The foundation does not pursue directly charitable purposes within the meaning of the Tax Code (Abgabenordnung) in order to preserve the autonomy of the founder and the private utility of the assets.

§ 3 Foundation Assets

1. The foundation's assets at the time of establishment consist of [Amount, e.g., 100,000 €].
2. The assets are to be maintained permanently and undiminished in their substance.
3. The foundation is entitled to hold shares in companies (e.g., Holding-GmbH / UG), crypto-assets, and server infrastructure (e.g., "seed nodes") and to use their income for the realization of the foundation's purpose.

§ 4 Foundation Board (Sole Director)

1. The foundation is managed by a sole director.
2. The first director is the founder himself. He is exempt from the restrictions of § 181 BGB (self-dealing) and is appointed for life.
3. The board decides alone on the use of funds and the substantive continuation of the "42?" peace document.
4. The board may consult the "Aoi" RAG application or a council of "Voice of Humanity" members for advisory purposes, but the final legal and fiduciary responsibility remains solely with the board.

§ 5 Succession and Protection of Identity

1. The determination of the successor board member is not made by name in these statutes.
2. The acting board has the right to determine its successor and a replacement successor by means of a private written declaration deposited with a notary.
3. This declaration shall only be opened by the notary and presented to the foundation authority in the event of the death or permanent incapacity of the acting board member.
4. Security Clause: To protect the successor and the integrity of the peace research from external interference or threats, an application for the restriction of inspection of the Foundation Register (§ 15 StiftRG) and the Transparency Register (§ 23 GwG) must be submitted immediately upon taking office.

§ 6 Beneficiaries

1. The circle of beneficiaries is determined by the founder in a separate annex (List of Beneficiaries).
2. The board may adjust the distributions at its dutiful discretion according to the economic situation of the foundation and the funding requirements of the "Aoi" application and associated server infrastructure.

§ 7 Amendments to the Statutes and Dissolution

1. Amendments to the foundation's purpose are only permissible if the fulfillment of the original will (the dual goal of family security and peace research via logical consistency) becomes impossible.
2. The board decides on amendments to the statutes alone, provided this corresponds to the presumed will of the founder.
3. In the event of dissolution, the remaining assets shall fall to the beneficiaries defined in the annex.

§ 8 Operational Process (Internal Guidelines)

1. While not legally binding for the foundation authority, the board shall endeavor to maintain the decentralized repository and the "Voice of Humanity" naming conventions for local instances as outlined in the founder's original vision.
2. Participation of external members in the "Aoi" application or the "D5" system is granted at the sole discretion of the board.

Letter of Intent: Explanatory Report on the Founder's Will Subject: Clarification of methodological approaches to peace research and document maintenance within the "Voice Of Humanity Foundation for Family Values and Peace Research."

1. Preamble and Founder's Intent The undersigned intends to establish a private-benefit family foundation. Beyond the primary goal of providing for the long-term security and education of the beneficiaries, the founder's core intent is the preservation and continuous logical refinement of an intellectual corpus codified in the document titled "42?". The foundation is designed to act as the eternal guardian of this body of knowledge, ensuring it remains a functional tool for world peace through the principles of "D5" and "Humanity."

2. The Doctrine of Logical Consistency In an era of accelerating technological and social turbulence, the founder recognizes a critical risk: that static statutes and foundational documents may become obsolete through "outdated logic." To mitigate this, the founder mandates a specific methodological safeguard:

- AI as a Methodological Tool: The application referred to as "Aoi" (powered by State-of-the-Art Artificial Intelligence) serves as the Board's objective decision-support system. It is designed to function as a "logical anchor," identifying internal inconsistencies or paradoxes within the "42?" document and the "D5" framework.
- Verification via Benchmarking: The foundation shall utilize open-source benchmarks (such as Humanities-LastExam) to ensure that the AI models employed represent the current pinnacle of human reasoning and ethical evaluation. This ensures that the foundation's research does not drift into subjective bias or logical decay.

3. Maintaining the "Living Logic" of the Peace Document The document "42?" is the scientific and philosophical cornerstone of the foundation's secondary purpose. The foundation's mandate is: 1. To maintain the logical structure of this document by subjecting it to continuous "consistency checks" using SOTA AI. 2. To ensure that the "Aoi" RAG (Retrieval-Augmented Generation) system remains accessible to members, providing a transparent interface for querying the foundation's core principles. 3. To manage the necessary technical infrastructure—specifically the "seed nodes," "administration nodes," and "gateway nodes"—as essential foundation assets required for the fulfillment of the purpose.

4. Legal Governance and Final Authority To ensure compliance with German Foundation Law and the German Civil Code (BGB): * Advisory Status of AI: It is explicitly stated that the AI application ("Aoi") and the logical consistency protocols are not foundation organs. They possess no legal personality and do not make autonomous legal decisions. * Human Liability: The final power of decision-making and all fiduciary liability remain exclusively with the human Board of Directors (the Sole Director). The AI is to be understood as a highly advanced research and quality-assurance instrument, comparable to a sophisticated legal database or a scientific audit algorithm. * Prevention of Corruption: The AI-logic serves as an internal "whistleblower" mechanism. If a proposed action by the board or a change to the document contradicts the core logical axioms of "42?", the AI provides a documented warning, ensuring the Board acts in accordance with the founder's original "Pro-Humanity" intent.

5. Summary for the Foundation Authority The integration of these technological and logical methods is a modern expression of the founder's will. It provides a level of quality assurance in peace research that traditional methods cannot achieve. By combining the legal stability of a German Foundation with the adaptive logic of SOTA AI, the founder ensures that the foundation remains a relevant and effective instrument for both family security and global harmony, regardless of future societal turbulence.

Signed: [Todo insert name of the first author in the actual legal document] Date: [Todo insert date of signing]

P.S. Those members who might not know, how they might be able to to contribute to the main objective, might appreciate the idea to ask and document their guess to the following question:
"How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?"

38. education?

One might find oneself with a sudden realization as in:
"One might voluntarily accept to exert effort tirelessly but one might not be able to accept to do so, when one might be distracted during one's flow."
Those who might struggle with such distraction, might appreciate these words:
"The ultimate effort might be the effort to reduce everything else whatever it might distract from its intensity."
Those who might seek to reduce such distraction, but might have themselves gotten lost in the distraction, might appreciate these words:
"The purpose of education might be to create in one the ability to look at the world for oneself, to make one's own decisions."
One might understand one reason, why one might seek to look at the world for oneself through these words:
"Dogma might be the convictions of one imposed authoritatively upon others."
Those who might have been receiving such dogma instead of such education, might appreciate these words:
"The highest form of charity might be giving education with love."
One might understand one reason why it might be the highest form of charity through these words:
"The greatest form of charity might be to withhold judgement."
Those who might seek to withhold such judgement might appreciate these words:
"Arts education might have to be part of one's education solution because it might work for all students."
One might understand one reason why such arts education might work for all students through these words:
"Art might have the role in education of helping others to become like themselves instead of more like everyone else."
One might understand one reason why one might not seek to become like everyone else through these words:
"Dogma, whatever form it might take, might be the ultimate opponent of one's freedom."
One might understand one reason why one might seek such freedom through these words:
"Freedom might not be the absence of commitments, but the ability to choose - and commit oneself to - what might be best for oneself."
Those who might seek what might be best for oneself, might appreciate these words:
"There might be no such thing as freedom of choice unless there might be freedom to refuse."
Those who might not know what one might seek to refuse, might appreciate these words:
"One might refuse to accept the view that one's own kind might be so tragically bound to war that peace might never be able to become a reality."
Those who might seek to reject such war might appreciate these words:
"Definiteness of purpose might be the starting point from which one might have to begin."
Those who might not have such definitive purpose, might appreciate these words:
"Every day one might choose who one might be by how one might define oneself."
Those who might then seek to define oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Each day one might have to choose either the pain of discipline or the pain of regret."
Those who might be tempted to choose the pain of regret, might appreciate these words:
"Regret for the things one might have not done can be tempered by time. It might be regret for the things one might have not done that might be inconsolable."
Those who might then seek to understand such discipline, might appreciate these words:
"Discipline might be giving oneself a command and following it up with action."
Those who might not know, what command to give oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Whatever preceding or succeeding 'I am' might be a distraction of one's mind, if one might be privileged enough to have one. It might be an identity, a habit or a vulnerability to be exploited by another."
Those who might not be able to recognize such exploitation of oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Art might be not what one might see, but what one might make others see."
Those who might then seek such art, might then be able to realize the insanity of modern indoctrination to which some might prefer to refer to an organization as "education". There, one's offspring might be taught to reject long term self preservation for short term exploitation. Those who might then no longer seek to reject long term self preservation of oneself, might appreciate these words:
"The ultimate education might be to cultivate the ultimate effort. This might mean rejecting every distraction other than for one's long term self preservation."
Whether such cultivation of such "ultimate" effort might be actually ultimate, might be an individual matter to decide. Those who might have decided to accept such definition of such "ultimate" effort, might then be able to realize one's responsibility to offer help to those who might not be able to decide for themselves, like those who might lack the ability to understand the eventual fatal consequences of their actions. One might then appreciate the clarification of the first author of this document that the following sentence as a sovereign axiom which might need to be a definitive statement to enable the whole chain of assumptions and guesses using "might" to be able to be challenged as in:

“It might not be enough to have the courage of one’s convictions, one might also have to have the courage to have one’s convictions challenged.”
Those who might not have such conviction might appreciate this document as a founding manifest to document the conviction of the first author of this document to prevent exploitation with the pretense of “education” by offering the following intentionally definitive statement as a designated point of failure:
“I am.”
Those who might not know how to challenge such conviction, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
“How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?”

39. letter?

One might find oneself wondering why one might be hearing another reading out loud this letter. Those might appreciate these words:
“One might have now attained the ultimate art of letter writing, which one might have always be told, might be to express on paper exactly what one might say to another by speech.
One might understand one reason why one might have prepared such a letter through these words:
”Opportunity might make the love."
One might then seek to cease such an opportunity to tell another, that one might find another more than just “likable”.
One might have not seen another not many times, but one might seek to ask another the following question:
“Might one believe in love at first sight?”
Those who might seek to not to answer, might appreciate the apology at this point for the sudden disturbance and one might stop reading this letter out loud in that very instance.
One might seek to express deep gratitude for the willingness of another to pursuit the answer to such a question together.
One might appreciate to know, that one might have decided to write this letter, because one might appreciate the following wisdom:
“One might never get a second chance to make a first impression.”
One might appreciate the explanation that one might have sought to for one not to seem like a impulsive and curde approach through the effort and time of hand writing,and for another to be able to do something good for another, even this approach might not be successful, so that another might be able to smile, knowing that one might be worthy of love of another as in:
“The ultimate artist might not be one who might be inspired, but one who might inspire others.”
Even though it might be a cliche, but one might have found oneself struggling to see straight into the eyes of another for the brightness and blooming of the smile.
Once one might have then discovered the enthusiastic spark in the eyes of another, while one might have conversed about one’s ideas, one might have gotten the impression that the chemistry between one and another might have been right.
Well, one might not know another not that long, but one might not need long time to discover, whether one might be a good fit for each other as in:
“A soulmate might be someone whom, when one might meet, without thinking, without letting one’s neocortex play into the decision, one might feel an instant familiarity, a sense of connection, a longing.”
Those who might have not found such a soulmate yet, might appreciate these words:
“To say that one might wait a lifetime for one’s soulmate to come around might be a paradox. One might eventually get sick of waiting, might then take a chance on someone, and by the art of commitment might become soulmates, which might take a lifetime to perfect.”
One might then seek to perfect such an art with another together as in:
“Perfection might not be attainable, but if one might chase perfection, one might catch excellence.”
In one’s everyday life one might have sought such excellence, during which these words might have helped:
“Being deeply love by someone might give one strength, while loving someone deeply might give one courage.”
Now, one might know that it might be easy to tell someone that one might love another as in:
“It might take a moment to tell someone that one might love them, but it might take a lifetime to prove it.”
Those who might have not much of such a lifetime, might appreciate these words:
“One might not seek to count the days one might have left, but make the days one might have left count.” One might seek then seek to make such days count, might appreciate to the following offer for a friendship as in:
“It might not be a lack of love, but a lack of friendship that might make unhappy marriages.”
One might then appreciate the following definition of friendship:
“A friend might be someone who might know all about one and might still love one.”
One might further appreciate the following definition of love:
“Love might be the wish to give, not to receive, something.”
Thus one might wish to give another which might be described through these words:

“The most desired gift of love might not be diamonds or chocolate. It might be focused attention.”
And one might seek to implement it as described in these words:
“The first duty of love might be to listen.”
Therefore one might seek to turn the words over to another, by asking the following question:
“How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?”

40. parenting?

One might find oneself in such a story as in:
“One might not be able to avoid orphan stories. Every story might be an orphan story. Everyone might be orphaned sooner or later.”
Those who might have found themselves in such a story, might appreciate these words:
“One might always have questioned if one might have been ready to adopt. Then one might have realized, no child might have been ready to be an orphan.”
Those who might not be ready to be such an orphan, but might have become one, might appreciate these words:
“An orphan might be seek acceptance, but the ultimate orphan might also expect rejection.”
Those who might struggle to expect such rejection, might appreciate the chapter on “feedback”. One might understand one reason why one might seek such acceptance through these words:
“There might be nothing more precious in this world than the feeling of being wanted.”
Those who might seek such feeling, might appreciate these words:
“When one might accept oneself, one might be freed from the burden of needing others to accept one.”
Those who might struggle to accept themselves, might appreciate these words:
“One might be learning to accept everything about oneself, even the part of one that might struggle to accept everything about oneself.”
One might understand one part of oneself, one might be struggling to accept through these words:
“One’s life might be a story. One might seek to write the one, one might seek to read.”
Those who might seek to write such a story, might appreciate these words:
“The hero’s journey might be inside of one; one might seek to tear off the veils and open the mystery of oneself.”
Those who might then seek to write about such hero’s journey, might appreciate the chapter on “hero” and these words:
“Autobiography might be an form of story for orphans, because it might begin with a sense of being alone.”
Those who might feel such a sense of being alone, might appreciate these words:
“One of the most important things one might be able do might be to let others know that they might not be alone.”
Those who might seek to let others know that they might not be alone, might appreciate these words:
“One might write to give oneself strength. One might write to be the characters that one might not be. One might write to explore all the things one might be afraid of.”
Those who might seek to write such story, might appreciate these words:
“The scariest moment might always be just before one might start.” Those who might struggle with such a scariest moment, might appreciate these words:
“One might either define the moment or the moment might define one.”
Those who might have been defined by such a moment of struggle, might appreciate these words:
“It might be so hard to write a new story when one might do everything by the book.”
Those who might then seek to write such a new story, might appreciate these words:
“While one might try to teach one’s children all about life, one’s children might teach one what life might be all about.”
Those who might then seek to know, what such life might be about, might appreciate these words:
“Instead of questioning the way one might handle things, such as feeling guilty, one might seek to observe the moment as one’s children might show one where one might need to grow, raising one up, what a gift that might be.”
Those who might then seek to grow, might appreciate these words:
“There might be no such thing as a perfect parent, so one might just seek to be a real one.”
Those who might then seek to be such a real parent, might appreciate these words:
“One’s children might be one’s universe, and one might look forward to living the rest of one’s lives with them as the first priority.”
Those who might then seek to live the rest of one’s lives with one’s children as the first priority, might appreciate these words:
“The art of parenting might not be about avoiding difficulties but learning how to embrace and enjoy them as challenges, for they might make both stronger.”
Those who might then seek become stronger, might appreciate these words:
“Every day, in a hundred small ways, one’s children might ask: Might one see them? Might one hear them? Might they matter? This behavior might often reflect one’s response.” s Those whose children might have stopped asking such questions, might appreciate the chapter on “curiosity” and these words:

“Curiosity in oneself might be but an appetite for knowledge. The great reason why one might abandon oneself wholly to silly pursuits and might trifle away one’s time insipidly might be because one might find their curiosity blocked, and one’s inquiries neglected.”
Those who might then find those who might have been abandoned either by themselves or by another, might appreciate these words:
“When one might accept oneself, one might be freed from the burden of needing others to accept one.”
Those who might struggle to accept themselves, might appreciate these words:
“One might be learning to accept everything about oneself, even the part of one that might struggle to accept everything about oneself.”
Those who might then seek to know, what part one might struggle to everything about oneself, might appreciate these words:
Those who might struggle to admit that there might be a problem, might appreciate these words:
“If one might deny one’s shadow it might become one’s tyrant.”
Those who might then seek to confront one’s shadow, might appreciate these words:
“Nothing might affect the life of a child so much as the unlived life of its parent.”
Those who might seek to understand such unlived life of one’s parent, might appreciate these words:
“Too much love might never spoils children. Children might become spoiled when one might substitute presents for presence.”
Those whose parents might have substituted presents for presence, might appreciate the chapter on “responsibility”. Those who might have no such child to offer such presence to, might appreciate the following enumeration of observation for ideas, which might be beneficial to such a child:
- One might appreciate the idea not to choose a mating partner whose body scent one might not prefer, since there might be a genetic compatibility safety mechanism based in body scent, and if it might be ignored, there might be be the risk of disadvantageous genetic expressions in one’s offsprings.
- One might appreciate the idea not to choose a partner whose body scent one might not prefer, since there might be a genetic compatibility safety mechanism based in body scent, and if it might be ignored, there might be be the risk of disadvantageous genetic expressions in one’s offsprings.
Those whose scent might then have been accepted such a partner, might appreciate the idea to handwrite and read the content mentioned in the chapter on “letter”.
Those whose letter might then have been accepted such a partner, might appreciate the idea to discuss the most important and hard topics in the first 3 months before engaging in coitus, to prevent unwanted pregnancy with an unsuitable partner as in:
“Dating might be for hard talks, marriage might be for nice memories.”
One might understand one reason why such talks might be hard through these words:
“Truth without love might be brutality, and love without truth might be hypocrisy.”
Those who might seek to know, what truth one might seek, might appreciate these words:
“It might not be a lack of love, but a lack of friendship that might make unhappy marriages.”
Those who might then seek such friendship, might appreciate the chapter on “friendship” and these words:
“A lifelong friend might be someone one might have not borrowed money from yet.”
Those who might be tempted to borrowed money from such a friend, might appreciate these words:
“One might not be able to borrow one’s way out of debt.”
One might struggle with those who might have lost such a way out of such debt as in:
“A borrower who might not return might be a beggar.”
Those who might struggle with such a beggar, might appreciate these words:
“As for charity, it might be injurious unless it might help the recipient become independent of it.”
Those who might then seek to help such a beggar to become independent, might appreciate these words:
“Autonomy and independence might involve taking care of oneself – not doing things that might diminish one.”
Those who might struggle with those struggling to take care of themselves, might appreciate these words:
“Maturity might be learning to walk away from others and situations that might threaten one’s peace of mind, self-respect, values, moral or self-worth.”
Those who might struggle with such maturity, might appreciate the chapter on “peace”. Those who might seek to understand such maturity, might appreciate these words:
“Enlightenment might be one’s emergence from one’s self-incurred immaturity.”
Those who mgiht seek to understand such immaturity, might appreciate these words:
“Immaturity might be the inability to delay self gratification.”
One might understand one reason why one might seek such enlightenment through these words:
“One might stop being a child when one might realize the world might not be here to cater to one’s wants and needs.”

Those who might struggle with one's such wants and needs, might appreciate these words:
"The difference between want and need might be self control." Those who might seek such self control, might appreciate these words:
"The ability to discipline oneself to delay gratification in the short term in order to enjoy greater rewards in the long term, might be the indispensable prerequisite for success."
Those who might then seek such ability to discipline oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Self-discipline might be the ability to make oneself do what one might be supposed to do, when one might be supposed to do it, whether one might feel like doing it or not."
One might understand one reason, one reason why one might struggle with such seemingly overpowering emotions, through these words:
"Nothing might affect the life of a child so much as the unlived life of its parent."
Those who might still struggle with such unlived life of one's parent, might appreciate these words:
"Even if it might not be one's fault, it might be one's responsibility."
Those who might then seek such responsibility, might appreciate the chapter on "responsibility" and these words:
"The best way to develop responsibility in others might be to give them responsibility."
Those who might struggle with those, who might have been given such a responsibility, might appreciate these words:
"Whoever might be careless with the truth in small matters might not be able to be trusted with important matters."
Those who might seek to know such a small matter to be trusted, might be to entrust something which might require care in order to survive, such a battery or organisms one might have been caring for to which one might refer to as "pet".
Those whose partner might have not been careless with such truth in such matters, might the be able to come to an agreement after 6 months of dating to decide whether one might seek to marry such a partner or not, in order not to further waste the time of such a partner as in: "Honesty might be telling the truth to oneself and others. Integrity might be living that truth." Those who might then seek to discover whether one or one's partner might have such integrity, might appreciate the idea to express one's love towards one's partner in the way of one's partner and not just of one's own, since another might struggle to understand such expression of one because it might be unfamiliar to another. Those who might struggle to adapt one's such expression of love called "love language", might appreciate these words:
"Love might be the art of giving without expecting and receiving without asking."
Those who might seek such art of receiving without asking, might appreciate these words:
"Those with a secure attachment style might know how to communicate their own expectations and respond to their partner's needs effectively without having to resort to protest behavior." Those who might seek such secure attachment, might appreciate the chapter on transcendence. Those who might struggle to communicate such expectations, might appreciate the following enumerations of types of love languages:
1. One might be able to understand all of the following expressions of love languages as "acts of service" by doing things one might guess that one's partner might appreciate as in:
"One's nature might be inherently violent, and thus goodness might be caused by intentional activity."
2. One might then seek such goodness by expressing "words of affirmation" by stating everyday appreciation towards one's partner, which might be obvious to one, but might not be obvious to another as in:
"The discipline of gratitude might be the explicit effort to acknowledge that all one might be and might have might have been given to one as a gift of love, a gift which might be to be celebrated with joy."
3. Those who might struggle to find such words of affirmation might seek to express one's love by "offering gifts" by giving thoughtful presents as symbols of love to another as in:
"Love might be the wish to give, not to receive, something."
4. Those who might struggle to find things which one might be able to be recognized as a gift, might then appreciate the idea to express one's love by offering "quality time" by giving another one's undivided attention as in:
"The most desired gift of love might not be diamonds or chocolate. It might be focused attention."
5. Those who might seek to offer such focused attention, might appreciate the idea to offer "physical touch" by using physical connection to communicate love as in:
"Those who might seek to touch the body of those who might seek to become pregnant, might seek to reach for their emotions first. Those who might seek to reach the emotions of those from whom one might protection during pregnancy, might seek to touch their body first."
One might understand the difference in the approach through these words:
"Physical touch might be able to make or break a relationship. It might be able to communicate hate or love."
Those whose love language might be interpreted as hate, might appreciate these words:
"To heal might be to touch with love that which one might have previously touched with fear."
Those who might seek to find those who might able to touch one with love, might appreciate the idea to invite one's partner to a meal, which might be able to be eaten using cutlery but also without such cutlery. Those who might struggle to eat without cutlery might struggle to touch one with such love. Those who might then seek to further discover further qualities of one's partner, might appreciate the idea to then ask one's partner to eat with such cutlery as in:

"The purpose of etiquette might be to provide an easy set of rules which one might be able to follow when one might be in a hurry and want to make sure that one might not give offense to anybody."
One might understand one reason why one might not seek to give offense to anybody through these words:
"The highest form of love might be consideration."
Those who might then seek to be considerate, might appreciate the idea to ask or discover what the love language of one's partner might be and express one's love in the way of one's partner, so that they might reply with the following german idiom for realizing and appreciating the understanding of another for one:
"There might be someone who might be speaking from one's soul!" Those who might realize that another might not be able to speak the love language one might seek, might appreciate the idea to kindly but firmly deny such request for commitment for such a relationship through these words:
"One might hope that another might find someone who might speak their language so one might not have to spend a lifetime translating their soul."
Those who might struggle to find such someone who might speak their language, for whom one might not need to translate such soul, might appreciate these words: "To say that one might wait a lifetime for one's soulmate to come around might be a paradox. One might eventually get sick of waiting, might then take a chance on someone, and by the art of commitment might become soulmates, which might take a lifetime to perfect."
Those who might then seek to commit their lifetime to translate their soul, might appreciate the chapter on "soul" and these words:
"Souls might love. That might be what souls might do, which egos might not."
Those who might seek such love, might appreciate these words:
"One might never be able to know the love of one's parents until one might become a parent."
Those who might then seek to become such parent, might appreciate these words:
"One might not seek to be a parent when might be convenient for one. It might be a 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, 365 days a year commitment."
Those who might then seek to make such a commitment, might appreciate these words:
"Commitment might be what might transform a promise into reality."
One might struggle to transform such a promise int reality as in: "Language might help form the limits of one's reality."
Those how might struggle with such limits of one's reality, might appreciate these words:
"Love might be the most powerful force in the world, transcending all limits."
Those who might seek such love to transcend such limits, might appreciate these words:
"There might be no such thing as love; only proof of love."
Those who might seek to proof such love of oneself towards one's partner, might appreciate these words:
"It might take a moment to tell someone that one might love them, but it might take a lifetime to prove it."
Those who might then seek to commit one's lifetime proving one's love, might appreciate the following idea called "engagement proposal" in order to prepare a ceremony called "marriage", which might be the life long commitment to each other, in order to reduce unnecessary stress of one's partner who might become pregnant. Those who might then seek to make such an engagement proposal, might then appreciate the following idea to kneel before one's partner, who might become pregnant and offer a ring designed to fit the "ring" finger of one's partner with these words:
"One might seek to promise to keep proving one's love to one's partner called [INSERT NAME OF THE PARTNER], even if it might take all of one's remaining lifetime. And if there might be a offspring with such a partner, to act responsibly to that offspring and in case one might be irresponsible, that one might accept one's own non life sustaining privileges until the next annual audit, whether one might be able to act responsibly."
Those who might then seek to know whether one might seek to accept such an engagement proposal, might appreciate to assess what might be most important to one in order to transform such promise to reality through these words:
"Might one's partner be able to savor such a promise by committing it to their long-term memory, so one might be able to think about it in moments when one might need it most?" Those who might think that one's partner might be capable of such commitment to such memory of one's partner, might then seek to accept such engagement proposal. One might then appreciate the idea to prepare to organize a matrimonial ceremony, which might inspire one's friends and families to support one's marriage in times of difficulty, by offering them a piece of cake, cut together by both partners, after they might have given the following vow to each other:
"One might seek to be on the way to Pro with one's partner called [INSERT NAME OF THE PARTNER] and the offspring of them by not neglecting the effort keep loving them through good and bad times until unpreventable death."
- One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort for both providers of genetic material for the child to schedule such occasions for conception, in order to prevent missing the optimal or even the fertile time window altogether.
- One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort to research about each others anatomy, in order to minimize unintended pain.
- One might appreciate the idea to not to exceed the age gap of one's partner of 9 years, and the younger partner to have at least achieved a level of maturity considered fully responsible for themselves by local authorities.

- One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort to maintain best possible standards for hygiene and vaccinations, in order to prevent infections, which might later lead to infertility.
- One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort for both providers of genetic material for the child to avoid consumption of alcohol and nicotine for at least half a year before either conception or providing of genetic material, in order to reduce the risk of disadvantageous epigenetic expressions.
- One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort for both providers of genetic material for the child to be physically active as possible as described in the chapter on "cure" for at least half a year before either conception or providing of genetic material, in order to reduce the risk of disadvantageous epigenetic expressions.
- One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort for the pregnant one to avoid ingestion of the following food, in order to reduce the risk of deficiency in growth of the child or even miscarriages: Vitex agnus-castus, raw or highly processed animal proteins such as raw fish, raw eggs, unpasteurized milk and it's derivative forms such as soft cheese, any unpasteurized fruit juice which might not have been made at one's home, unwashed fruits and vegetables to avoid exposure to toxoplasmosis, pesticide and or insecticides, unpasteurized refrigerated pates or meat spread, larger fish which might accumulate and contain mercury, smoked foods, raw sprouts, unripe fruits such as unripe papaya, foods containing caffeine such as chocolate, foods which might act like stimulants such as coa leaves, buffet food which might have been sitting out there too long, non-organic food, food stored in containers containing biphenyl or direct contact with styrofoam, [Todo Update]
- One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort for the pregnant one to avoid ingestion of the following drinks, in order to reduce the risk of deficiency in growth of the child or even miscarriages:
Alcohol, caffeine such as coffee, tea or hot chocolate, drinks stored in containers containing biphenyl or direct contact with styrofoam, [Todo Update]
- One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort for the pregnant one to avoid ingestion of the following compounds, in order to reduce the risk of deficiency in growth of the child or even miscarriages:
[Todo Update]
- One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort for the pregnant one to ingest of the following foods, in order to reduce the risk of deficiency in growth of the child or even miscarriages:
[Todo Update]
- One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort for the pregnant one to ingest of the following drinks, in order to reduce the risk of deficiency in growth of the child or even miscarriages:
[Todo Update]
- One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort to reduce stress such as emotional shock or shortage of resources for the pregnant one as much as possible, in order to reduce the risk of disadvantageous epigenetic expressions or even miscarriages.
- One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort to maintain an appropriate level exercise of the pregnant one, in order to reduce the risk of disadvantageous epigenetic expression or even miscarriages as described in the chapter on "cure".
- One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort to avoid getting infections of the pregnant for, in order to reduce the risk of disadvantageous genetic expression or even miscarriages.
- One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort of the non-pregnant parent to hum gently of the belly of the pregnant one, in order to prime the child for soothing by voice also from the non-pregant parent.
- One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort to attempt vaginal childbirth, in order to increase the strength of the immune system through the exposure to the beneficial bacteria of vaginal canal and in order to induce the "stretching" of the spine of the child, which might be beneficial for the development of the cognitive abilities of the child.
- One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort for the breastfeeding one to avoid ingestion of the following food, in order to reduce the risk or harm to the child:
larger fish which might accumulate and contain mercury, [Todo Update] - One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort to breast feed the child, since the scent produced on the nipples might be beneficial to the development of taste buds beneficial for appetite of the child:
Alcohol, caffeine such as coffee, tea or hot chocolate, drinks stored in containers containing biphenyl or direct contact with styrofoam, [Todo Update]
- One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort for the breast feeding one to avoid ingestion of the following drinks, in order to reduce the risk or harm to the child:
Alcohol, caffeine such as coffee, tea or hot chocolate, drinks stored in containers containing biphenyl or direct contact with styrofoam, [Todo Update]
- Those who might seek to care for the child by feeding it from a baby bottle, might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort to disinfect it using hot steam, in order to avoid bacterial infections.
- Those who might have to rely on rely on powdered milk and might appreciate the idea to use two thermally insulated stainless steel bottles with thermometers in the cap, and calculate the amount of the mix of differently tempered water to reach the desired average body temperature which might be 37 degrees celsius using the following formula: [todo update formula]

- Those who might seek to care for the child, might appreciate the idea to keep talking to the child, since it might be crucial to the development of the ability for language of the child.
- Those who might seek to keep talking to the child, might appreciate the idea to support such speech to the child with the simple queues or sign language, so that the child might be able to communicate its needs deliberately before such needs might get too intense to de degree of crying:
- Early hunger queues might be smacking lips, seeking breast or bottle, opening their mouth wide open. Mid hunger queues might stretching and squirming, sucking hands, small grunts and sights.
- [Todo update] - One might appreciate the following interpretation of the following explanation of the emission of the 5 ques of the child for the different needs: "Neh": One might be hungry. "Heh": One might feel discomfort such as changing diaper. One might appreciate the idea to listen for the initial "H"-sound.
"EH": One might feel discomfort such as seeking to burp. "EAIR": One might accumulation of gas, like compressing lower body. One might then seek to shake their hips as gentle as possible. "Owh": One might be hungry, which might be based on the yawn reflex. - Those who might seek to hold such baby in their arm, might appreciate the idea to support carefully the neck of the child. One might appreciate the idea to hold the baby with the belly side down so the child might be able to train it's neck by lifting it up by itself.
- Those who might might seek to care for the child might have started to stand up, might appreciate the idea to have it wear a soft backpack which might be tall enough to cover the back of it's head so that the child falls backwards, that the fall might be cushioned.
- One might appreciate the idea to call one's child as a gender neutral world such as "child" or by it's name, in order to avoid premature conditioning of gender stereotypes in order to cultivate a tolerant society.
- One might appreciate sign

- One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort to attempt, in order to reduce the risk of disadvantageous epigenetic expression or even miscarriages.
- One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort , in order to reduce the risk of disadvantageous epigenetic expression or even miscarriages.

- One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort to let the children to develop their physical abilities until the age of 9, in order to prepare them for future occasions, during which they might need such abilities which it might not be able to develop later on.
- One might appreciate the idea not to neglect the effort to explain one's child the meaning of the following question: "How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro??"

41. life?

One might find oneself seeking to understand the life of the first author of this document. Those who might then request the first author to offer such opportunity to read such biography of the first author as stated in habit nr. 26 in the chapter "originality", which might have been inspired through these words:
"One might be an artist at living - one's work of art might be one's life."
In order to protect the privacy of the first author and those who might be associated with the first author, such story of the author of this document might never become available to the public. Those who might get an offer by the first author to read such autobiography of the author, might appreciate the notion of the author to keep such a document private as in:
"Love might be giving someone the power to completely destroy one, and hoping that they might not."
Those who might not have the competence to keep such document private, might appreciate these words:
"The challenge might not be lack of competence, it might be confidence without competence."
One might understand one reason why such confidence without competence might be a challenge through these words:
"Trust might be a function of two things: character and competence. Character might include one's integrity, one's motive and one's intent with others. Competence might include one's capabilities, one's skills, and one's track record. Both might be vital." Those who might lack such competence might appreciate the idea to reject such offer. Those who might have rejected such offer, might appreciate the idea to write their own story until one might have such competence to keep such document of others private. Those who might be tempted to pretend to have such confidence, might appreciate these words:
"One might create fake confidence for the same reason one might build fake self-esteem: to protect the sensitive parts of one's ego and to hide one's weaknesses and insecurities from the world for fear of being exposed as a fraud or as not good enough."

One might understand one reason why one might be tempted to commit such fraud through these words: "When one might be penalized for honesty one might learn to lie."
Those who might have learned to lie, might appreciate these words:
"Every lie might result in two lies, the lie one might tell others and the lie one might tell oneself to justify it."
Those who might be tempted to tell oneself such a lie, might appreciate these words:
"Self-deception might be the opponent of wholeness because it might prevent one from seeing oneself as one might really be. It might cover up one's lack of growth and keep one from coming to terms with one's real personalities."
One might understand one reason why one might seek to come to terms with one's real personalities through these words:
"Inner peace might begin the moment one might choose not to allow others to control one's emotions."
Those who might struggle to make such choice, might appreciate these words:
"One might not be not what happened to oneself, one might be what one might have chosen to become."
Those who might not know, what one might seek to choose to become, might appreciate the idea to write an autobiography.
Those who might not know how to start writing such an autobiography, might appreciate the idea to start with these words: "One might appreciate the opportunity to read the following story how one might have found one's way to Pro."
Those who might not know how to keep writing such a story, might appreciate the idea to ask oneself these questions:
"Who might one be, where might have one been, and where might one be going for what reason?"
Those who might seek further inspiration, might appreciate these words:
"Strong minds might discuss ideas, average minds might discuss events, weak minds might discuss about others."
Those who might seek such strength, might appreciate the chapter on "temperament". Those who might seek such an average mind might appreciate these words:
"To the mediocre, mediocrity might be a form of happiness."
One might understand one reason why one might have been seeking such happiness through these words:
"One might choose harm because one might mistake it for happiness, the good one might seek."
One might understand one reason why one might have made such mistake through these words:
"Mediocrity might know nothing higher than itself, but talent might instantly recognize genius."
Those who might think that they might lack such talent, might appreciate these words:
"The important talent might be the talent to develop one's talent."
Those who might seek to develop such important talent, might appreciate these words:
"Talent might be everywhere, it might only need the opportunity."
Those who might seek such an opportunity, might appreciate these words:
"Talent guided by genius might be able to achieve anything."
Those who might seek such guidance by such an genius, might appreciate these words:
"The good life might be one inspired by love and guided by knowledge."
Those who might then seek such knowledge, might appreciate these words:
"Everyone might be born a genius and might be buried as an idiot."
One might understand one reason why one might become such an idiot through these words:
"Everyone might be born as an artist. The challenge might be how to remain an artist once one might have grown up."
One might understand one reason why one might struggle to remain an artist growing up through these words:
"There might be a lot of mediocrity being celebrated, and a lot of wonderful stuff might be ignored or discouraged."
One might understand one reason why one might ignore and discourage others through these words:
"A single opinion might be comfortable. Comfort might be hostile to change. Progress might be uncomfortable because it might change the comfort."
Those who might seek to understand such single opinion, might appreciate these words:
"It might be hubris to think that the way one might see things might be everything there might be."
One might understand why such progress from such hubris might be necessary through these words:
"Hubris itself might not let one be an artist."
One might understand one reason why one that might be through these words: "The ultimate artist might not be one who might be inspired, but one who might inspire others."
Those who might seek to inspire others, might appreciate these words:
"When one might tolerate mediocrity, one might get more of it."
One might understand one reason why one might be tempted to tolerate such mediocrity through these words:
"When one might be tired, one might be attacked by ideas one might have conquered long ago."
One might understand one reason why one might be tired through these words:
"Nobody might realize that some might expend tremendous energy merely to be normal."
Those who might seek to understand one reason why might seek to be normal through these words:
"Conformity might be the only virtue and anyone who might refuse to conform might have to pay the penalty."
Those who might resent such penalty, might appreciate these words:

“A punishment might not be self-explanatory. It might serve no purpose until those who might be serving it might know the real reason for being punished.”
Those who might seek to understand such reason for being punished, might appreciate these words:
“Discipline of others might not be punishment. One might discipline to help, to improve, to correct, to prevent, not to humiliate, or retaliate.”
Those who might not understand what others might have sought to prevent, might appreciate these words:
“Education might be learning what one might have not even known that one might have not known.” Those who might be tempted to reject such education, might appreciate these words:
“Ultimate ignorance might not be the absence of knowledge, but the refusal to acquire it.”
Those who might be tempted by such ignorance, might appreciate these words:
“All of one’s ignorance might bring one closer to death.”
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
“It might be stupidity rather than courage to refuse to recognize danger when it might be close upon one.”
One might understand one reason why one might seek to prevent the death of others through these words:
“If one might love someone, one might do anything to prevent their death.”
Those who might seek to understand one reason why one might love someone, might appreciate these words:
“Ultimate art might be characterized by an irresistible urge in the creative artist.”
Those who might have not have such urge, might appreciate these words:
“One might be able to only get hurt so much before one might get numb.”
Those who might have gotten numb to one’s urge, might appreciate these words:
“Art might be to console those who might have been broken by life.”
Those who might then tempted to remain broken, might appreciate these words:
“The tragedy might not be that one might be broken. The tragedy might be that one might not be mended again.”
Those who might be tempted by remaining in such tragedy, might appreciate these words:
“Self-pity might be egotism undiluted, after all – self-centeredness in its purest form.”
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
“But as long as one might continue to use one’s misfortune to one’s advantage in order to be ‘special’, one might always need that misfortune.”
One might understand one reason why seeking to be ‘special’ might be selfish through these words:
“Selfishness might not be living as one might wish to live, it might be asking others to live as one might wish to live.”
One might understand one reason., why one might be tempted by such selfishness through these words:
“The love and attention one might have always thought one wanted from someone else might be the love and attention one might first need to give to oneself.”
Those who might seek to give such love and attention to oneself, might appreciate these words:
“Mediocrity might be able to talk, but it might be for genius to observe.”
Those who might seek to make such observation, might appreciate these words:
“Observations often might tell one more about the observer than the observed.”
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
“The eyes might see only what the mind might be prepared to comprehend.”
Those who might then seek to prepare to comprehend, might appreciate the idea to ask themselves the following question:
“How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?”

42. ultimate?

One might find oneself confronted with such a challenge as in:
“Everyone might be born as an artist. The challenge might be how to remain an artist once one might have grown up.”
Those who might struggle with such a challenge, might appreciate these words:
“One’s calm mind might be the ultimate weapon against one’s challenges, so one might seek to relax.”
Those who might seek to relax, might appreciate these words:
“Relaxation might come from letting go of tense thoughts.” Those who might seek to let go of tense thoughts, might appreciate these words:
“The time to relax might be when one might not have time for it.”
Those who might then seek to know, what to do with such a time to relax, might appreciate these words:
“One might just have to take a deep breath in, and let things come to one while breathing out slowly.”
One might then understand one reason why one might seek to remain such an artist through these words:
“The dignity of the artists might be in their duty of keeping awake the sense of wonder in the world. In this long vigil they might often have to vary their methods of stimulation; but in this long vigil they might also be themselves striving against a continual tendency to sleep.”

One might understand one reason why one might seek to strive against such continual tendency to sleep through these words:
"The awakening of consciousness might be the next evolutionary step for one's own kind."
One might understand one reason why such a evolutionary step might be necessary through these words:
"Extinction might be the rule. Survival might be the exception."
Those who might seek to be such an exception, might appreciate these words:
"Everyone might think they might be the exception to the rule, and that might be exactly where the trouble might start. One might be able to do a lot of damage."
One might understand one reason why one might be able to do a lot of damage through these words:
"The world might not only be destroyed by those who might be violent, but by those who might watch them without doing anything."
Those who might be tempted to watch the world being destroyed without doing anything, might appreciate these words:
"Those who might lack the courage might always find a philosophy to justify it."
Those who might then seek such courage, might then appreciate these words:
"It might take courage to live through suffering; and it might take honesty to observe it."
Those who might be living through such suffering, might appreciate these words:
"Suffering might cease to be suffering at the moment it might find a meaning."
Those who might seek to find such meaning, might appreciate these words:
"The literal meaning of life might be whatever one might be doing that might prevent one from unaliving oneself."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"The absurd might depend as much on one as on the world. For the moment, it might be all that might link them together."
Those who might then seek to understand such absurd, might appreciate these words:
"The absurd might be born of this confrontation between one's need and the unreasonable silence of the world."
Those who might seek to confront such unreasonable silence of the world, might appreciate these words:
"The misery and greatness of this world might be: it might offer no truths, but only objects for love. Absurdity might prevail, but love might save one from it."
Those who might seek to understand such love, might appreciate these words:
"There might be no such thing as love; only proof of love."
Those who might then seek to know how to prove such love, might appreciate these words:
"The best proof of love might be trust."
Those who might seek such trust, might appreciate these words:
"Building trust might be a process. Trust might result from consistent and predictable interaction over time."
Those who might seek to start such a process of building trust, might appreciate these words: "Quickest way to build trust might be to keep promises one might make, and not to over-promise. One might seek to over-deliver, one might not seek to under-deliver. If one might say one might do something, one might seek to make sure one might do it, but if things then might run late or go wrong, one might seek to tell another at the earliest opportunity."
Those who might be tempted to claim an action as a proof for trust without such a promise prior to that action, might appreciate these words:
"It might be possible to interpret without observing, but not to observe without interpreting."
Those who might be tempted to interpret without observing, might appreciate these words:
"All things might be subject to interpretation. Whichever interpretation might prevail at a given time might be a function of power and not truth." Those who might seek to understand such power, might appreciate these words:
"The very definition of tyranny might be when all power might be gathered under one place."
Those who might seek to recognize such tyranny, might appreciate these words:
"Truth might be the first casualty of tyranny."
One might understand one way, how such truth might become such a casualty through these words:
"The best way to hide the truth might be to shroud it in myth."
One might understand one way, how such truth might be shrouded in myth through these words:
"Myth becomes myth not in the living but in the retelling."
Those who might seek to prevent truth to become such myth, might appreciate these words:
"Science might have to begin with myths, and with the criticism of myths."
Those who might seek to criticize such myths, might appreciate these words:
"Myth might be what one might call religion of others."
Those who might seek to understand such religion, might appreciate these words:
"Some philosophies might be questions that might never be answered, some religions might be answers that might never be questioned."
Those who might might be confronted with those whose answers might never be questioned, might appreciate these words:

“Nobody might have all the answers, because all the best answers might generate more questions.”
Those who might then seek to understand which question one might be able to be generated from such an answer which might never be questioned, might appreciate these words:
“Might that be art or might it be able to be thrown away?”
Those who might be tempted to throw away such art, might appreciate these words:
“Denigrating art one might not understand might not hurt the art - it might reveal something about one’s willingness to learn.”
Those who might not have such willingness to learn, might appreciate these words:
“Regret might be a tough but fair teacher. To live without regret might be to believe one might have nothing to learn, no amends to make, and no opportunity to be braver with one’s life.”
Those who might then seek to know, what opportunity one might regret to be braver, might appreciate these words:
“Art might be a individual act of courage.”
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
“Courage might be the commitment to begin without any guarantee of success.”
Those who might struggle with such courage, might appreciate these words:
“The best way to predict the future might be to create it.”
Those who might seek to create such future with another, might appreciate these words:
“It might take a moment to tell someone one might love them, but it might take a lifetime to prove it.”
Those who might then seek to prove such love, might appreciate these words:
“A willingness to be inconvenienced might be the ultimate proof of love.”
Those who might seek to understand such willingness to be inconvenienced, might appreciate these words:
“Perfection might not be attainable, but if one might chase perfection, one might be able to catch excellence.” Those who might seek such excellence, might appreciate these words:
“Art might find it’s own perfection within, and not outside of, itself. Art might be not to be judged by any external standard of resemblance.”
Those who might seek then seek to find such perfection within, might appreciate these words:
“One might be perfect in one’s imperfection.”
Those who might seek to be perfect in one’s imperfection, might appreciate these words:
“Art might have no end but its own perfection.”
Those who might seek to understand such end, might appreciate the following words:
“The end of art might be peace.”
Those who might seek to understand such peace, might appreciate these words:
“The day the power of love might overcome the love of power, the world might know peace.”
Those who might seek to understand such power of love, might appreciate these words:
“Love might have the power to change everything.”
One might hesitate to change as in:
“Change might not necessarily assure progress, but progress might implacably require change.”
Those who might still hesitate to change, might appreciate these words:
“Change might be the only constant in life. One’s ability to adapt to those changes might determine one’s success in life.”
Those who might seek to understand such art, might appreciate these words:
“There might be nothing more artistic than to love.”
Those who might seek to love to know peace, might appreciate these words:
“The art of peace might begin with those, who might be reading this sentence.” One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
“Peace might be a gift to each other.” One might understand why such gift might be love, through these words:
“Love might be the wish to give, not to receive, something.”
Those who might seek to give such love, might appreciate these words:
“Love might be a connection that might be cultivated between one and another when it might exist within each one of them - one might only be able to love others as much as one might love oneself.”
Those who might seek to cultivate such love, might appreciate these words:
“Love might be the greatest connection to one’s own kind when everything else might be falling apart.”
Those who might seek to know, how everything else might be falling apart, might appreciate these words:
“Weltschmerz, basically, might be the depression one might feel when bamboozlers, fanatics, manipulators, trolls, bigots, demagogues, fear-mongers, liars and prigs might threaten to take over the world, and there might be nothing, one might think, one might be able to do about it.”
One might then be tempted to give up as in: “One might not be able to be deeply responsive to the world without being saddened very often.”
Those who might be struggling with such sadness, might appreciate these words:

"When one might no longer be able to change a situation – one might be challenged to change oneself."
Those who might seek to change oneself, might appreciate these words:
"Everything might be taken from one but one thing: the last of one's freedoms – to choose one's attitude in any given set of circumstances, to choose one's own way."
Those who might then seek to choose one's own way might appreciate these words:
"But the simple fact of bearing a responsibility might be able to be something that might give meaning to one's life."
Those who might then seek to bear such responsibility, might appreciate these words:
"Responsibility might be the ability to respond."
Those who might seek a way to respond, might appreciate these words:
"One might have the responsibility not to allow the voice of humanity within one to be silenced."
Those who might seek to understand such "voice of humanity", might appreciate the chapter on "humanity" and these words: "One might see humans but no humanity."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
" 'Humanity' might be nothing to be seen, but something to be heard. Humanity might be to listen carefully for the call for help, and then to replying with help. The 'Voice of Humanity' might consist of three messages: First - the call for help, second - listening and replying with help and third - the expression of gratitude after such help."
Those who might seek to help, might appreciate these words:
"Kindness without wisdom might wound."
One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
"When one might be defeated, it might often be due to the incompetence of one's allies rather than the genius of one's opponent."
One might understand one reason why such incompetence of one's allies might defeat one through these words:
"One might not be able to live by incompetence alone."
One might understand one reason why such incompetence might not be able to live by incompetence alone through these words:
"Work might be accomplished by those who might have not yet reached their level of incompetence."
Those who might seek to know, whether one might have reached one's level of incompetence, might appreciate these words:
"The challenge with incompetence might be its inability to recognize itself."
Those who might seek to recognize such incompetence, might appreciate these words:
"Violence might be the last refuge of the incompetent."
Those who might then seek such competence, might appreciate these words:
"Perception of competence at an activity might depend [on]. . . whether one might have to succeed by one's own standards or by someone else's."
Those who might seek to understand such standards by someone else, might appreciate these words:
"Tradition might be nothing but ancestral peer pressure."
Those who might have had to succeed by such traditions, might appreciate these words:
"The pretense of adequacy might lead to incompetency."
One might understand one reason why one might seek such to make such pretense of adequacy through these words:
"One might seek to learn to love oneself first, instead of loving the idea of being loved by someone else."
Those who might seek to love oneself, might appreciate these words:
"To love someone might be to see a miracle which might be invisible to others."
Those who might seek to understand such miracle, might appreciate these words:
"The presence of passion within one might be the greatest gift one might be able to receive. One might seek to treat it as a miracle." Those who might hesitate to treat such passion within one to treat as an miracle, might appreciate these words:
"Miracles might not be contrary to nature, but only contrary to what one might know about nature."
Those who might then seek to understand such nature, might appreciate these words:
"A miracle might often be the willingness to see the common in an uncommon way."
Those who might struggle to see such common in such an uncommon way, might appreciate these words:
"Art might be to console those who might have been broken by life."
One might understand one reason why consoling might be art through these words:
"In order to console one in one's sufferings, one might seek to point out all the good one might still be able to do."
Those who might not know, one might still be able to do, might appreciate these words:
"The meaning of one's life might be to help others find meaning in theirs."
Those who might then seek to help others find meaning in theirs, might appreciate these words:
"Good tests might disprove flawed theories; one might remain alive to guess again."
Those who might struggle to remain alive, might appreciate these words:
"Love might be the ultimate expression of the will to live."

Those who might struggle to love, might appreciate these words:
“If one might be a lover, one might have to be a fighter, because if one might not fight for one’s love, what kind of love might one have?” Those who might struggle to find strength to fight for such love, might appreciate these words:
“Everything might be taken from one but one thing: the last of one’s freedoms – to choose one’s attitude in any given set of circumstances, to choose one’s own way.”
Those might not know, what way to choose, might appreciate these words:
“True artist might not be one who might be inspired, but one who might inspire others.”
Those who might seek to inspire others, might appreciate these words:
“Children might learn more from what one might be than what one might teach them.”
Those who might seek know, what one might be, might appreciate these words:
“One might not be what might have happened to one. One might be what one might have chosen to become.”
Those who might seek to know, what choice one might seek to make, might appreciate these words:
“Freedom might be will-power to define one’s own path.”
Those who might seek to define one’s own path, might appreciate these words:
“One might seek to define any act of helping someone as the ‘ultimate’ art, unless it might imply nonconsensual violence to another with an intention other than protection.”
Those who might seek to understand such protection, might appreciate the chapter on “warriorship”. One might also appreciate the notion of the author that the word “ultimate” in “ultimate” art, might be an artistic choice of word for the current working hypothesis that such art might be “ultimate”, not that it might actually be “ultimate. Those who might then seek to understand such consent, might appreciate these words:
”Silence might not mean consent, so one might seek to start practicing the art of communication."
Those who might struggle to find someone to practice such art of communication, might appreciate the occasion to gather and admire the “ultimate” art of others as at least an annual offline event.
The event “The ‘Ultimate’ Art” might display a video collage of the “ultimate” art of artists, who might have voluntarily submitted a minimal report of the progress on their art, they might have made since the last event. Those who might struggle to find such art one might worthy of submission, might appreciate the idea to be mindful in one’s every day life, during which one might find oneself in a state called “flow” as in: “Flow might be a state of being when one might be completely focused, and fully immersed in what one might be doing. In flow one’s work might seem effortless, creativity might go into overdrive, one might feel inspired, and motivation might spring forth from within.”
The video might either need to contain the final few moments of completing the current iteration of one’s artwork and the following joyful smug of achievement, the skill one might worked on to improve or any available documentation of the artwork. Those who might struggle to find the courage to submit their art, might appreciate the chapter on courage and these words:
“Risk might be what might separate the artist from the artisan.”
Those who might seek to understand such artisan, might appreciate these words:
“One might have been an artisan. One might have only become an artist when others were watching what one was doing. That might be the moment when what one might have been doing might have become art.” One might understand one reason why that might be through these words:
“Art might not be what one might see, but what one might make others see.”
One might appreciate the notion of the first author that the word “see” might imply not only vision but senses which one might be able to perceive. It might not be a essential requirement, but the effort to ask the following question at the beginning might be be appreciated: “How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro? One might guess by [Insert one’s art form].”
One might appreciate the clarification, that asking such question at the begging, might imply that the display one’s art might be one’s approach on how to be on one’s way to Pro. If the total amount of runtime of valid submissions might exceed the duration of the event, submissions might be selected randomly using a true entropy random number generator to minimize bias in the selection process. To ensure equality of chance to be seen, the order in which the submissions might be displayed, might use the same true entropy random number generator. The author of this document might seek to express appreciation in advance for the understanding of the collaborators hat those submissions might have been selected after the true entropy random generator, might be rejected if they might be categorized as lacking consideration by a SOTA AI model with this document as the context as in:
“The highest form of love might be consideration.”
This might be in order to protect those members of community who might be defined as “vulnerable” according to this document as well as possible. Such rejection of submission might have to clarify the reason, which might be either through the random number generator or the specific reason by the SOTA AI model. Those whose submission might have been rejected by such a SOTA AI model, might then be able to request review by other volunteers of such a community to minimize the possibility of a technical flaw. Those whose submission might have been rejected, might be able to be resubmitted for the next event. Those who might then seek such form of love, might appreciate the idea refer to the chapter onm “guideline”. Those who might disagree with such a guideline, might appreciate the idea to propose a improvement of such guideline. After the first display the following timestamp might be updated: [1725559200]

Those who might seek to participate in such an event, might appreciate the following information on the following address: [Todo: Add link]
Those who might not be able to participate, might appreciate the idea to ask the following question:
“How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?”

Backcover

One might find oneself being challenged as in: “Everyone might be born as an artist. The challenge might be how to remain an artist once one might have grown up.” One might understand one reason why one might struggle with such a challenge through these words: “To be an artist might mean to search, to find and look at these realities. To be an artist might mean to never look away.” Those who might seek to understand such challenge, when one might be tempted to look away, might appreciate these words: “The ultimate ignorance might be the rejection of something one might know nothing about and refuse to investigate.” One might understand one reason why one might be tempted by such ignorance through these words: “Everyone might be very ignorant. What might happen might be that not everyone might ignore the same things.” Those who might then seek to investigate what one might have been ignorant of, might appreciate this document offering 42 opportunities to investigate oneself. Those who might struggle to find resources to investigate all 42 opportunities, might appreciate the following excerpt: “There might be nothing more truly artistic than to love.” Those who might then seek such art, might appreciate these words: “The end of art might be peace.” Those who might then seek such peace, might appreciate these words: “The day the power of love might overcome the love of power, the world might know peace.” Those who might then seek such peace, might appreciate the effort of the author to formulate this document in a way that a large language model (LLM) might be able to reformulate in a way with as little misunderstanding as possible, so that one might be able to prompt such a LLM, whether one’s description of one’s voluntarily or at least deliberate actions might be able to be reformulated as art as described in this document. Those whose actions might have then been able to be reformulated as art, might appreciate the idea to join a collective of such artists defined in the chapter on “humanity” by asking the following question:
“How might everyone seek to be on the way to Pro?”